This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

A reprint of the fourth edition of the Catalogue has become necessary after the expiration of a period of four years; it has in many respects been increased and improved, although not to the same extent as the last edition. As heretofore, the information concerning the acquisitions, the arrangements and the changes which have been effected in the Royal Picture Gallery during this period, has been given in the Introduction; in the Catalogue itself such corrections with regard to the names of the artists, the origin and signatures of the pictures etc., as have been verified during that time, have been conscientiously made. The numbers which have heretofore been attached in the Catalogue to the pictures of the old Schools have, in general, been retained, and the recent additions, so far as they have found a place in the Catalogue itself, have been designated by letters that the former editions might not be rendered entirely useless. The most recent additions to the Gallery will be found in an especial Appendix. By the use of a smaller type, the Catalogue has been materially diminished in size, and thus rendered lighter and more convenient for reference and use.

May this reprint, therefore, be received with a favour equal to that accorded to its predecessors.

Dresden, May 1876.

Engravings of such pictures as are designated in the Catalogue with a star (*) are for sale in the Entrance Hall of the Royal Picture Gallery. These consist partly of of good, old impressions of the earlier, so-called Gallery Work, at reduced prices, and partly of recent engravings of which a detailed list, with prices attached is appended to the Catalogue.

The letters and figures in the Catalogue under the numbers of the pictures (in parenthesis) refer to the place where each picture is to be found. The large halls are designated by large Roman letters and the walls in each by the figures, 1. 2. 3. 4. etc.; the smaller rooms by figures, and their walls by letters a. b. c. d. For a more particular explanation the visitor is referred to the Plan of the Rooms of the Royal Picture Gallery at the end of the Catalogue.

Introduction.

"Wer Vieles bringt, wird Manchem etwas bringen!"

Goethe.

The New Museum, with its world renowned Picture Gallery, now welcomes the visitor, favourably impressed at the very entrance, into the cheerful halls of a real palace of art. The works of the immortal masters of every school and period strike the delighted eye with heightened brilliancy, and with increased interest the questions crowd upon the astonished spectator: how, and under what circumstances, can it have been possible to unite in one collection so rich and glorious a multitude of the finest specimens of the various schools of Art? Under which of the Saxon sovereigns; through whose coöperation; from what countries, and for what sums were these treasures obtained? How have they, hitherto, been preserved and their number increased through all the vicissitudes of time? What fortunes have befallen the Gallery, as such, during an existence of more than a century? — questions, indeed, which have often been asked in times past, and now when the Collection is, in its completeness, so much more advantageously situated, they occur only so much the more frequently to the mind of the observer. Yet not one of the numerous catalogues which have thus far appeared, has even attempted to answer these questions in any particular. So much the more pressing appeared the necessity of venturing such an attempt to the author of a new catalogue which is, in some degree, intended to commemorate the event of the transfer of the pictures to their new locality as a marked epoch in the history of the Gallery. The circumstance of having no predecessor in this field of labour has its favourable and its unfavourable aspects. It is undoubtedly favourable, if the author can feel sure of offering to the public something hitherto unknown, but it is a most unenviable task to search into sources of information long neglected; to arrange materials and to be obliged to turn away unsatisfied from much that has become obscure and confused through the lapse of time and thus, unavoidably leave many questions, at least for the present, but partially answered.

All researches into the oldest sources of information lead us back to a so-called "Kunstkammer", already commenced by the early rulers of Saxony, as the origin of all the collections.

Origin of the collection.

This, however, contained not only paintings and statuary, but also among objects of art of every kind, a great number of so-called "curiosities" and elaborate works, of which the greater part are still to be seen in the Green Vaults. Such a "Kunstkammer" existed in most of the castles of the reigning princes, as early as the commencement of the sixteenth century; they were in fact to be found in the castles of such of the more powerful counts and nobles as exhibited a sympathy for the refinements of cultivated life.

Kunst-Kammer.

In the older part of the palace in this city, the Elector Augustus I. also, had, as early as 1560, collected into a Kunstkammer* all works

* It consisted of seven rooms in the Electoral Palace, and contained, besides the jewels and curiosities which were kept there for safey, a not unimportant number of paintings which adorned the walls: "portraits, Biblical pictures and other historical subjects painted by Albr. Dürer, Titian, Tintoretto, Luc. Cranach, Rubenio, Concheten (?) Luca von Leyden, Barmisano and other artists" as the old chronicler Weck relates. A collection of the less important objects which had not been incorporated in the other collections existed under the original name until within a very recent period.

The Anatomical chamber, a room containing skeletons, anatomical preparations etc., in the upper "Tabulat", (story), just above the Kunstkammer, is described — according to Weck's chronicle — as of this kind in his possession; among others it probably contained most of our present pictures by Cranach, Dürer and other early German masters which, at least in part, began to be collected under Duke George the Bearded, during the lifetime of Frederick the Wise, and Cranach, and was increased and enriched by his successors.

Italian pictures also therein.

This collection however, already contained a number of valuable Italian paintings, which, in the formation of a Gallery, and in the oldest inventory of 1722 and the following years, are expressly mentioned as "taken from the Kunstkammer." This inventory was commenced in likewise decorated with landscapes by Kilian Fabritius, who died about 1670. Whether these were painted on the walls, or were hung thereon is not quite clear; it, however, contained paintings also, at a subsequent period, as is proved by the old inventory.

Also in other places, as, for example, in the churches and chapels there were some pictures which were, at a later time transferred to the Gallery. There was further, in the rooms of the Royal palace, especially during the life-time of Augustus III., a large number of the choicest works which had been selected by the express direction of the king. Among these were especially the Magdalene by Correggio, and the best specimens of the small Dutch pictures. When these, in 1817 under Frederick Augustus the Just, were incorporated with the Gallery, it was necessary, in order to procure space, to place a large number of other pictures in the so-called Doubletten (Duplicates) Gallery (now the Exhibition Building on the Brühl'schen Terrace), These formed the "Vorrath" (reserved pictures) as it was called, and were from time to time, again placed in the Gallery, with the exception of a few of the less important that were disposed of by auction.

1722 under the direction of Baron Raymond le Plat, Architect to His Majesty, and first Director of the Picture Gallery, and was continued until 1728 by the chamberlain and Inspector Steinhäuser whose manuscript catalogue in 8vo extends to 1747, although in imperfect annotations; both are preserved in the archives of the collections.

Besides the pictures already collected in the above-mentioned Kunstkammer, there was, according to an inventory first undertaken in July 1722 "of all the paintings belonging to His Royal Majesty in Poland and Electoral Highness in Saxony" a still larger collection of more or less valuable pictures taken from the various capitals and castles of the Saxon princes, including some from churches and chapels, to form a Gallery now for the first time so-called. The locality designated "Gallery and adjoining rooms" was in the Electoral "Stallgebäude", the corner stone of which was laid July 6. 1586 in the time of the Elector Christian I. It contained in front towards the so-called "Jüdenhof" (Jews' court) a large hall and stately rooms (the "lower Stallzimmer") which were likewise decorated with pictures and were occasionally used as state apartments for foreign guests.*

* Among others, two Polish princes Jac. and Const. Sobiesky resided here in 1707, and in 1712 the cardinal Christian Augustus Duke of Saxon-Zeitz. Below were stalls for 180 horses, and rooms for costly state carriages, sledges, harness etc. The present Royal Armoury from the Töpfergasse to the Elbthor, which with its open arcades towards the

The pictures in the Gallery, properly so-called, were arranged in the second story, and in the examination of the old inventory undertaken in 1742 are more particularly recapitulated as follows:

In the upper 1st Gallery	144 pictures.
In the upper 2d Gallery and corner rooms	164 „
In the 11 adjoining rooms . . .	1445 „
In the lower stall rooms	185 „
Total	1938 pictures.

The number of the pictures in the rooms mentioned in List A. in the first edition being added to the above, we find that the total of all the pictures at that time amounted to 4708, of which 3110 were valuable and 159 inferior.

Restoration of the Gallery.

In August 1744, all the pictures in the 2d story, as we are informed by J. A. Riedel in his Diary, were carried by soldiers to the Japanese Palace in Neustadt, and the restoration of the now called old Gallery in the Jüdenhof commenced. The restoration could have consisted in nothing more than an alteration of the first and second stories into a single lofty room with correspondingly high windows and better light, as the alterations must otherwise have required more time than was actually employed. For before the end of the year 1746, court at that time surrounded the tilt-yard is nearly in its former condition, and the wall towards the Augustusstrasse was then also decorated with paintings, as now again with the cavalcade of the Saxon sovereigns in sgraffito.

the whole collection in the Japanese Palace had been examined anew, the copies rejected, and the original pictures taken to the Gallery, as we are informed by the above mentioned annalist. In this year also arrived the Modena Gallery which was at first arranged in the Palace, where a number of the pictures were restored. Before the end of the year, however, these paintings were placed in the Gallery and arrangements made for their exhibition.

In 1747 the inner Gallery, which was probably still undergoing a partial enlargement, "was also arranged anew, and the Italian pictures hung therein", — an arrangement which was, in general, also retained later.

The so-called "Lieferanten".

About this time we begin to notice in the inventories a number of names of so-called "purveyors" (Lieferanten) mostly Art Dealers, persons connected with the Gallery etc., but some of persons of high — even the highest — rank, who, as warm friends of art, were actively interested in the growth of the Gallery either as noble donors or agents in the purchase of pictures. A list of these names placing in curious juxtaposition the best known persons of that period and the most obscure and quaint individuals, was appended to the preface to the first edition for the benefit of the "curious reader", especially those who were acquainted with the circumstances of that time in this city. To gain space, this list has been omitted in the present edition as the names of such persons are also mentioned in the catalogue in connection with the pictures.

The most flourishing period of the acquisitions.

The most brilliant period of the acquisitions to the Gallery, when those pictures were purchased which still shine as the brightest jewels of our collection, was under the sway of Augustus II. and still more especially that of Augustus III. (1733—1763) and his favourite and all-powerful minister, Reichsgraf Heinrich von Brühl. Both names are almost every where noticed in connection with the purchase of the greatest master-pieces in the Collection.

King Augustus III. and Count Brühl.

If it is undeniably the stern duty of the Muse of History to sit in judgment on the human weaknesses and faults even of kings, a more agreeable task has fallen to the biographer of the Gallery, — that of being permitted to dwell only on the bright traits in the character of Augustus III.; and even the pliant adviser and executor of his royal will, the oft-mentioned count Brühl, appears in this field of his activity, as a man who, actuated by great zeal and genuine love of art, shewed himself capable of assisting in a munificent manner in the execution of his royal master's designs.

But the person whose services Brühl more especially employed in enlarging the Gallery, as well as the Collection of Engravings and the Library, was his private secretary, the well-known Carl Heinrich von Heineken* (born at Lübeck 1706, died at Altdöbern 1791). The name of this man should be the less forgotten in this place, as malice and want of judgment have long enough deprived him of his just reputation through his having been, at the death of his patron, Brühl, unjustly involved in the disgrace into which, not without cause, the latter had fallen. That it was he who really created the Gallery is proved by a letter of Brühl's to Heineken from Warsaw, Nov. 23d 1748, in which he intrusts to him the critical decision concerning some pictures offered for sale, in the following words: "je les soumets à vôtre jugement, car la galérie est vôtre production et j'en ay que l'honneur mais à vous apartient la gloire." Only the glowing enthusiasm of King Augustus for art, the critical eye of Heineken and the munificence of Brühl, who always knew where to find the immense sums required, were able by their union to produce a Gallery like that of Dresden.*

* So he signs himself in his documents.

The most considerable and important of the acquisitions of King Augustus both in number and value is undoubtedly the purchase of the so-called "Modena Gallery"; more properly, a collection of one hundred pictures from the Galleries of Duke Francesco of Este-Modena

* I have already in the first edition of my catalogue (v. Anm. p. XVII) adduced the strongest evidence, which has not been controverted, that no other than Heineken could have been the author of the well-known „Abrégé", the only valuable critical and historical catalogue of former times. Subsequent and more particular research has enabled me to discover the peculiar position of Heineken as author of the publication; I must, however, for want of space here, reserve a further discussion of the subject for a special essay at some future time.

which were partly in Modena and partly in Ferrara. This difficult transaction was effected through the agency of Count Villio, at that time Saxon Ambassador in Venice; Ventura Rossi, painter to the court, (di d at Venice 18. October 1766) furnished with special powers from Saxony; Pietro Guarienti of Dresden, afterwards Inspector of the Gallery (born 1676 died May 26 1753), and old Zanetti* in Venice, a celebrated connoisseur of that period; while the financial arrangements were intrusted to the banker, John Thomas de Rachel of Dresden, specially sent to Venice for the purpose, and his brother Paul Moritz Rachel of Venice. From numerous original letters of both and particularly of the former, it is quite apparent throughout the course of the intricate transaction how the Saxon agents were annoyed by cunning and avarice.

A momentary financial embarrassment of Francesco III. Duke of Este-Modena was skilfully employed by King Augustus in his ardent love for art and desire to increase his Gallery, — a feeling in which Brühl fully participated — to secure the purchase of the most important paintings of the Este Gallery.

* Antonio Maria Zanetti, (born 1716, died 1778,) had earlier made the most important purchases in Italy for the Regent, Duke of Orleans. In one of his letters he regrets that the Modena purchase had not been intrusted to him alone; he would have obtained the whole Gallery for the same price: the offer, in his opinion, should have been made in gulden rather than in sequins — "perché fa piu strepitoso il numero!"

 Francesco III. of Este-Modena, only son of Rinaldo, who died October 26, 1737, was married

The Duke and his State officers and agents, the Prime Minister Marchese Rangoni and the Finance Minister and Auditor General Msgr. Bondigli, were well aware of the weight of the responsibility which they incurred in permitting the removal of such a treasure from their native country, and the negotiations could only be carried on with great secrecy, in consequence of their fear of the opposition which had become to Charlotte Aglaë of Orleans, and succeeded his father on the Ducal throne. During the War of Succession which, notwithstanding the Pragmatic Sanction, broke out after the death of Charles VI., Francesco joined the Spaniards, and later, even commanded in person a part of his own troops, as he was not deficient in talent and had already taken part in the war in Hungary in 1737. In 1742, before he had determined to join the Spaniards, he passed some time in Venice, having transferred the government to a Giunta of nobles and state officers who opened Modena to Victor Emanuel of Sardinia. Thus he lived as ex-Duke in Venice (1743); his wife went to France and there gave her eldest daughter Felicità d' Este in marriage to Louis de Bourbon, Duke of Penthièvre. Francesco received the title of Generalissimo of the Spanish forces and joined the army. In the attack on Velletri by Lobkowitz, it was with difficulty that he avoided being taken prisoner. In 1745, Francesco passed the winter in Venice and its neighbourhood, and it was during this time that the purchase of the Modena pictures was effected, as the Duke was in great need of money, his land being constantly in the hands of the enemy and exposed to the miseries of war. At the Congress of Nice in 1749, Duke Francesco came once more into the possession of his Duchy and the Hungarian dependencies, but the magnificent collection of pictures was forever lost to his country. See. Leo's Gesch. Italiens T. V. Buch XII. Cap. I.

apparent in Modena itself, even some of the Duke's counsellors being decidedly against the sale. Rossi himself was obliged to examine the pictures, in order to approve of the selection, with the same secrecy and under a false name. New difficulties were constantly raised on the part of the Modenese agents who delayed the negotiations, and to overcome all obstacles many important concessions of money were still required besides the price, already fixed, of one hundred thousand sequins — a sum which was for that period indeed enormous.

It was only after the greatest exertions and with the help of a "regalo" of one hundred sequins* paid to Bondigli, that the Saxon agents finally succeeded in conveying the pictures, which were already packed in cases, into neutral territory in Rossi's house in Padua. Here they were to remain as a deposit until the sum fixed as the price should be paid. As the payment was somewhat delayed, a further amount of 7000 sequins was required, as an indemnification, to prevent the whole transaction even at this stage, from being broken off (see the original contract signed at Ferrara Sept. 17. 1745). Finally, when everything seemed in order, Bondigli refused to deliver up the gilt frames, as they were not expressly mentioned in the contract. He furthermore extorted from the unhappy Rossi 1000 sequins for himself, for consenting to accept in payment four State bonds, bearing interest; one for 50,000, one for 42,000, and two for 4,000 sequins, and for postponing the cash payment until after the Easter Fair in 1746. It should not be forgotten that it was also stipulated that a copy of Correggio's celebrated "Night" was to be furnished to the seller, which Rossi consented to procure.*

On the other hand it was expressly stipulated in the contract that the copy of the Christo della Moneta by Flaminio Torre should also be delivered to the Saxon agents, as they on their part feared, not indeed a dishonest exchange of the pictures by the Italians, but the assertion so often heard in similar cases that the original picture had not really been sold.

It was also stipulated in the contract that the copy should, at a later time, be returned, but it has, for some unknown reason, remained in the Gallery.

On the arrival of the pictures in Dresden, Guarienti asserted in a statement appended to the original list, that a picture by Annibale Carracci, the so-called Suonatore di Liuto (Luteplayer), named also "il Mascherone", was missing; as, however, the picture is actually in the Gallery, it appears to have been sent at some later time.

* Whether he painted it himself or, as is more probable from a statement in the Galleriewerk, commissioned Nogari to do it, cannot be ascertained from the documents.

Although the price of these pictures mentioned above is so large it may be boldly affirmed that at the present day a collection of one hundred paintings, containing among others six such exquisite pictures by Correggio; the Tribute Money by Titian; the Portrait of Morett by Holbein; the great pictures by Paul Veronese, and so many masterpieces of the Bolognese school, could not be purchased at present valuations for ten times the sum, if in fact, it could be obtained at all.

We need only remember that a few years since a Madonna by Murillo was purchased in Paris for 615,300 francs.

Ventura Rossi boasted with justifiable pride that he had been able to secure also the "famosissima Maddalena" by Correggio, which, with four other paintings was, at first, expressly mentioned as not included in the sale. He could not however, at the same time suppress an almost mournful confession that he, an Italian, ought not to have been instrumental in depriving his native land of such a jewel. No doubt it required, for this purpose, in addition to the sacrifice of his national pride, no little diplomatic skill, which he wished to be appreciated by His Majesty as an especial claim to favour.

The shrewd Italian must have breathed more freely when all the intricate stipulations were fulfilled, and we sympathize still more with the joy of the honest Paul Moritz Rachel in Venice at seeing the disagreeable business finally adjusted, when both were, at last, able to report that the five wagons, well packed with pictures and duly furnished with a royal "permit", had left Venice, via Vienna, on the 6th of July 1746, for Dresden, where they arrived in the course of the following month.

This joy was, however, premature, at least for the good Rachel, for his next letter, which was indeed the last, informs his "cher frère" in Dresden of the indescribable embarrassments which he had suffered in effecting the payment to Msgr. Bondigli.*

It was not enough that it had been very difficult to collect one hundred thousand sequins in coin, it was required that each piece should be weighed, even those newly coined, and the smallest difference adjusted, which necessarily involved much haggling and sending of the pieces to and fro, — a day's work for which the poor banker can find no words sufficiently dreadful. But even these twenty four hours came to an end, and the great transaction was completed.

At the close of the letter, Bondigli is cursed by our tormented countryman in the most cautious language, while Sig. Marchese Rangoni is described as a perfect nobleman, and is even expressly recommended to his "cher frère" as worthy of a present of a piece of porcelain from his Excellency the Reichsgraf von Brühl.

* In his letter he says: "The Modena affair is so far adjusted that my brother has been able to depart, but God only knows to what annoyances I am still exposed from the hard, impolite and unreasonable Bondigli" etc.

 The original is as follows: "and this venerable Cavalier, whose probity shines so brightly, Presents of porcelain.

It may here be mentioned as a circumstance worthy of note that in most of the important purchases of that time, a piece of porcelain from the world-renowned manufactory in Meissen was included in the price, sometimes indeed as a special condition; and it occurred so frequently that Brühl felt obliged to remark, once for all, that such claims were very distasteful to His Majesty, and that, in future, he must forbid most decidedly, similar "vague" promises of remuneration in addition to the fixed purchase price.

Purchase of the Madonna by Holbein, 1743.

But how openly, in general, the circumstances of those times permitted the payment of a gratuity to all who were connected with, or concerned in such a purchase, we shall soon have occasion to mention when speaking of the purchase of the celebrated Madonna by Holbein in Venice by the well-known Count Francesco Algarotti, the intelligent friend of Augustus and of Frederick the Great. A more particular account of this transaction, as it appears in Algarotti's own letters and journals, may not be uninteresting to those interested in the history of art and to admirers of this exquisite picture.*

really deserves a marque d'estime from your court, mon cher frère, etc."

That something of the kind was actually sent to him, is not to be doubted; at least the above mentioned Zannetti, then in his 75th year, received a gold mounted porcelain casket which Algarotti himself took to Venice from Dresden by Brühl's order. (Algarotti's Journal.)

* Compare the most recent works concerning Holbein and our picture by A. Woltmann; Th.

This splendid work of Hans Holbein the Younger* (born in Augsburg, or as some affirm, in Basle 1478, died in London 1543) was originally, as it is now known, painted for Jacob Meyer, Burgomaster of Basle, whose family it represents as under the protection of the Virgin. On the right of the Virgin kneels Fechner; A. v. Zahn and His-Heusler; J. Janssen, Edward Engerth, and others.

* After our picture was placed side by side with that of Darmstadt in 1871, the genuineness of the former was still more a matter of doubt than before, and it was pronounced by some distinguished connoisseurs to be a later copy. Of this, there was, however, no more proof than of the contrary assertion, as was unanimously admitted. The author of this catalogue, like many others, on a comparison of the two pictures, saw no reason to change his former opinion that the Darmstadt picture is an earlier representation, and that in Dresden a later repetition by the hand of the same master. Until historical documents are found to prove the contrary, this opinion, supported furthermore by a certain ideality in the Dresden picture, which is also admitted by impartial opponents, must be considered as uncontroverted.

 There is still in the Museum at Basle, among other excellent works by H. Holbein, a number of masterly studies for our picture drawn in red and black crayons, and a painted portrait of the same Jacob Meyer, at an earlier age, with his young wife. Our picture was, for a long time, considered to be a representation of the family of Thomas More until those drawings were discovered in Basle. Another painting of this subject exists in Darmstadt, as is well known, in the possession of Princess Elisabeth of Hesse. Concerning the relations of the two pictures to each other, there has been much dispute. (See former note.)

the father with his two sons (the youngest, a naked child); on the opposite side is his wife, Dorothea Kannengiesser, with her mother and daughter.

It was first purchased in 1633 from a descendant of the Meyer family for 1000 Thaler, by Michael Blon, Royal Swedish agent in Amsterdam, who is often mentioned by Sandrart as a zealous collector and friend of art. It was afterwards sold by him, on earnest solicitation, as Sandrart likewise mentions, to the rich book keeper, Johann Lössert of Amsterdam for 3000 gulden. He purchased it, in fact for Mary de Medicis, but as she died about this time (July 3, 1642) he probably kept it for himself. Between 1690 and 1700 Lössert, or his heirs, became bankrupt and Holbein's picture came into the possession of the banker Avogadro of Venice, in payment of a debt of 2000 sequins. By him it was bequeathed to the Delfino family. (See Algarotti's correspondence.)

The painting seems to have remained in Venice for a long time unknown and unappreciated, (although the Regent, the Duke of Orleans, who died in 1723, had made an attempt to buy it), for Algarotti gives an animated description of the visits which the Venetian artists made to him, in order to see this magnificent work of art, and how he prudently showed them first his Carlo Marattis and Bassanos, that he might finally dismiss them with a view of Holbein's Madonna, as we give Tokay at the end of an entertainment that our guests may depart with the sweetest taste on the tongue.

The merit of Algarotti in having again found and rightly appreciated such a picture deserves the higher commendation as the prevailing taste of the day was in direct opposition to it, and the insipid creations of Carlo Maratti were universally admired.

Algarotti had purchased Holbein's magnificent painting in 1743 in Venice from the eldest member of the family, a Mr. Zuane (Giovanni) Dolfino (or Delfini), and we append, according to promise, his own account of the cost:

Holbein-legend.

It may not be superfluous, in addition to these historical facts, to mention a tradition, or rather legend, connected with this picture by Holbein, which has recently received additional though unfounded confirmation from the inscription on the beautiful and deservedly popular engraving by M. Steinla, which makes the more imperative a careful examination of the evidence. In the latin inscription on this fine engraving, stands the oft repeated story that the Virgin of Holbein's picture holds the sick child of Burgomaster Meyer in her arms — it is actually declared to be the subject of the painting, so that the uninformed must believe that this statement mentions a well-known and undoubted fact. It is, on the contrary, not founded on any historical proof whatever, and there is no where to be found, in early allusions to the picture, the least hint of such an interpretation of the picture †. The opinion which has really become a local one, can be traced back only as far as the beginning of this century, and probabl had its origin in a remark of Frederick Schlegel's who may have advanced the idea as an explanatio of the circumstance that the Infant in this pictur really has a depressed, sickly expression.

* Probably the carter.

 Sanctissima Mater Dei parvulum aegrotantem filium Jacobi Meyeri, Consulis Basileensis, ulnis fovens, pater ipse cum reliqua familia genuflexi adorant.

† Sandrart who lived almost a century nearer Holbein's time than we do, distinctly says: "a Virgin, standing with the Infant in her arms" etc.

But independent of the fact that Holbei and his entire century, far removed, as the were, from a conception so wholly modern, woul scarcely have ventured to treat the sacred perso of the divine Infant with so much levity, ther are numerous other internal reasons for re jecting this assumption. Among the most strikin of these, may be mentioned the movement o the hand of the child, undoubtedly raised i the act of blessing: how can this be appropriat to the sick child of the Meyer family? Agai how is to be excused the evidently brotherl caress of the elder boy to the supposed infa Christ, and the childish and even naïve actio of the child itself? how to be explained th quiet, typical, almost indifferent manner of a the other members of the family under suc extraordinary circumstances? Ever new contr dictions, which are only increased on close examination, speak decidedly against the co rectness of this not unpoetical explanation.

The fact noticeable more or less, in almo all early German representations of similar sub jects, that the Infant is less successfully treate than the mother and other figures, has apparentl given rise to this interpretation of the pictur while the natural explanation of the fact lies, in our opinion, in the real difficulty of the task; and in the want of study of beautiful forms and of the antique; added to which, the restless movements of the little models sufficiently account for some want of success, even with such a master as Holbein. The youngest child of Meyer, whom the artist saw in person before him, and to whom he was not required to lend any ideal characteristics or movement, was therefore the more successful work.

Holbein's picture belongs, in its conception, entirely to the earliest class of similar representations, inasmuch as the kneeling family is depicted as literally under the mantle of the Virgin, (see the shoulder of the elder Meyer) "as a brood under the mother's wings", in accordance with the type of the protecting Madonna, who is often represented in older pictures with the civil and ecclesiastical authorities of whole cities under her mantle. After the Reformation, the crucified and risen Saviour took the place of the Madonna, and we often see, especially in connection with monumental representations in churches, biblical subjects of symbolical meaning, e. g. the elevation of the brazen serpent; the raising of Lazarus etc. In such instances, the family are generally in the foreground of the picture, painted mostly on a much smaller scale; but the kneeling posture, and the rigid separation of sexes as in our Holbein, are always observed.*

* The Cocina Family, the magnificent picture by Paolo Veronese, is also a repetition of this typical idea in the Italian style, and in a still freer artistic form.

Mr. Hubert Morrett by Holbein.

One other work by the same master, forming, like this family picture, a culminating point of its kind among single portraits, must be mentioned here — the exquisite portrait of Mr. Hubert Morrett, Goldsmith to Henry VIII of England. It offers, at the same time, an opportunity to the historian of the Gallery to give a striking example of uncertainty concerning the names of authors.

The picture came into our Gallery with the Modena purchase, as if the best works even of German Art could, at that time, only come from Italy, and it was considered as a work of Leonardo da Vinci's.*

At a later period, it was supposed that there were good grounds for considering it to be a portrait of Ludovico Sforza, named il Moro.

* It cannot, however, be denied that the authorship of Leonardo was by no means assumed in Modena itself, at least in former times, with so much certainty as it appears to have been in our catalogue of the Modena pictures. On the contrary, the well known work of Scannelli (Microcosmo Ediz. di 1657, (p. 266) contains, under the name of "Olbeno" (Holbein), a description of a picture in the Modena collection which evidently can be no other than our Morrett. This is a circumstance to which Cav. Discar, an art critic of Modena, in a paper addressed to the Directors of our Gallery in 1860, especially calls their attention. We may add to this remark that in the same work of Scannelli, in the passage which particularly refers to the works of Leonardo in the Modena purchase, no picture is mentioned which in any respect resembles that in our Gallery. Scannelli on the contrary, speaks only of a half-length figure of Saint Catharine, and the head of a youth in armour, as works by Leonardo da Vinci.

Thus it was designated until Rumohr first named the younger Holbein as the painter of the picture, and von Quandt in an excellent essay (see Kunstbl. 1846, No. 9) convincingly pointed out the person represented.

It is a singular circumstance that even in this night of error a spark of truth was left glimmering, in the preservation of the syllable "Mor".

Out of Morrett, probably the word Morus was first formed (Thomas Morus, who was always first thought of in connection with any unknown portrait by Holbein; as was the case with the family Meyer which was supposed to be the family of Morus, as already mentioned); but in Italy, Morus naturally became Moro.

But who in Italy knew any other Moro than the great Sforza? and who could have painted him except his great countryman, Leonardo? — a portrait withal so exquisite in execution, so perfectly finished, even to the hair!

With respect to any chronological doubt, there was no very accurate examination into the subject; the portrait became that of Ludovico Sforza, painted by Leonardo da Vinci, and thus it remained, as has been said, until a revived acquaintance with the German School restored his work to the honest Basle artist, and, after further research, the likeness of the old goldsmith was found again in an engraving by W. Hollar.

If, nevertheless, the evidence as to the authorship of Holbein afforded by Hollar's certainly very imperfect and superficial engraving might be considered insufficient by some particularly unbelieving souls, all doubt is henceforth at an end, since the discovery of the beautiful original drawing of Holbein for our picture. It was found at the sale of the pictures of the Art Dealer, Samuel Woodburne, in London, and purchased through the instrumentality of Dir. L. Gruner in 1860, and since that time has been placed in the Holbein room for the examination and conviction of all interested.

Acquisition of the Sixtine Madonna.

We must now refer to the purchase of a work which, in consideration of its extraordinary artistic value, and of its celebrity, should have taken precedence of any other picture; but a due regard for chronological order, as well as its undeniable inner relationship with the previously mentioned Madonna by Holbein, furnish us here with the most suitable opportunity for its discussion. We refer to the acquisition of the celebrated Sixtine Madonna, the gem of the Dresden Gallery.

This work of Raphael's, painted in his best period, the only one in oil that for grandeur of conception and thoroughly intellectual freedom in execution stands fully on the same level as those grandest creations of Christian art, his cartoons for tapestry, was painted, as Vasari informs us, for the principal altar of the Black Friars' Monastery of San Sisto in Piacenza. There it remained until seen with enthusiastic admiration by Augustus III., when still Crown Prince, on a journey to Italy in 1711—12, at which time he already formed a resolution to possess himself of it if possible.

But not until forty years later, in 1754, did he succeed, through the agency of the painter Carlo Cesare Giovannini, in obtaining it. This artist, (born in Parma 1695, resided in Bologna from 1723, and died June 30, 1758) after a careful examination of the condition of the painting, and a detailed report concerning it, effected its purchase for the Dresden Gallery for 20,000 ducats, or 40,000 Roman scudi.*

A copy of the picture of the original size was also stipulated for in the sale; this was painted by the Venetian artist Nogari and, as usual, is said to be still considered as the original in the monastery.

A painting, similar to ours, exists in Rouen. It is related that an abbess of the Abbey S. Amand in that city had begged a picture of the

* A copy of the report of Giovannini concerning a careful examination of the picture in which he was assisted by Dottore Abbate Giov. Batt. Bianconi of Piacenza lies before us; the original is, according to a note at the end, in the possession of Gaetano Giordani in Bologna.

Giovannini had caused the picture to be taken down from the altar, and expresses first his opinion as to the undoubted genuineness of the painting, which was in fact "cosa veramente rarissima e singolare", as Vasari had already remarked. He found but few defective places in the vesture, and dark spots on the body of the Child, which were occasioned by a too thick coating of lasur (?) varnish here and there, by the master himself. The picture had suffered more from dryness, as it been standing undisturbed on the altar for more than 200 years. He also discovered that the upper part of the canvas had been turned back, and advised that this should be remedied immediately on its arrival in Dresden.

the father with his two sons (the youngest, a naked child); on the opposite side is his wife, Dorothea Kannengiesser, with her mother and daughter.

It was first purchased in 1633 from a descendant of the Meyer family for 1000 Thaler, by Michael Blon, Royal Swedish agent in Amsterdam, who is often mentioned by Sandrart as a zealous collector and friend of art. It was afterwards sold by him, on earnest solicitation, as Sandrart likewise mentions, to the rich book keeper, Johann Lössert of Amsterdam for 3000 gulden. He purchased it, in fact for Mary de Medicis, but as she died about this time (July 3, 1642) he probably kept it for himself. Between 1690 and 1700 Lössert, or his heirs, became bankrupt and Holbein's picture came into the possession of the banker Avogadro of Venice, in payment of a debt of 2000 sequins. By him it was bequeathed to the Delfino family. (See Algarotti's correspondence.)

The painting seems to have remained in Venice for a long time unknown and unappreciated, (although the Regent, the Duke of Orleans, who died in 1723, had made an attempt to buy it), for Algarotti gives an animated description of the visits which the Venetian artists made to him, in order to see this magnificent work of art, and how he prudently showed them first his Carlo Marattis and Bassanos, that he might finally dismiss them with a view of Holbein's Madonna, as we give Tokay at the end of an entertainment that our guests may depart with the sweetest taste on the tongue.

The merit of Algarotti in having again found and rightly appreciated such a picture deserves the higher commendation as the prevailing taste of the day was in direct opposition to it, and the insipid creations of Carlo Maratti were universally admired.

Algarotti had purchased Holbein's magnificent painting in 1743 in Venice from the eldest member of the family, a Mr. Zuane (Giovanni) Dolfino (or Delfini), and we append, according to promise, his own account of the cost:

for transport, the very considerable size of the painting is strongly against the supposition that it was intended for processional uses. The opponents of this statement have urged with as much justice as sagacity that with so correct a taste as Raphael possessed, he certainly would not have chosen for a banner, which, even though it were not to float in the wind, must nevertheless be in constant motion, the rectilinear, heavy architectural cornice which forms such an appropriate finish for an altar picture, and harmonizes so well with the structure of the altar itself. But was all this, together with the little angels below, painted at a later date? And by whom?

The simple statement of Vasari also contradicts it: "Fece a monaci neri di S. Sisto in Piacenza la tavola dell' altar maggiore, dentrovi la nostra Donna con S. Sisto e S. Barbara, cosa veramente rarissima e singolare". That Vasari calls the picture, which he may only have seen above the altar, a "tavola" (panel), is, considering the agreement of the description with the picture in other respects, certainly not decisive.

Former condition of the picture.

This great painting has unfortunately not remained untouched by the ravages of time, as was already mentioned in Giovannini's report. But it has suffered still more from the copyists of former times, who, in order to bring out more clearly some obscure parts, made unpardonable use of the most deleterious means; for instance, of frequent rubbing with a mixture of oil and saliva, which produced dirty spots of the worst kind, especially around the head of Madonna.

All these injuries to the picture were removed under a careful restoration by Palmaroli, in 1827, at which time the upper part of the curtain and a part of the glory of angels which had been recklessly turned back, was at length unfolded, and the picture restored to its original size, although, as above mentioned, the observant Giovannini had long before discovered the misfortune, and recommended its correction. Restoration by Palmaroli in 1827

At the end of April or the beginning of May of the year 1754, Giovannini himself brought the Madonna di San Sisto to Dresden, as appears from his letter dated hence May 21, 1754,* and it may be permitted in this place to mention a pleasing tradition connected with the arrival of the picture in this city.

King Augustus, impatient to see again the long expected picture, had ordered its immediate unpacking and exhibition in the palace. When it was brought into the throne room, and there was a momentary hesitation as to placing it in the best light, which happened to be just where the throne stood, the King pushed the latter quickly aside with his own royal hand, exclaiming: — "Make room for the great Raphael!"

Truly, a right royal speech and a testimony to the equality of intellectual greatness and worldly power which does honour both to him and to his age.

* This letter is preserved in the state archives in this city, but it does not mention the exact day of the arrival of the picture. G. left Bologna in Nov. 1753 and went to Piacenza. See my Essay on the Sixtine Madonna in A. v. Zahn's Jahrbüchern, Sept. 1870.

Truly, we owe a large debt of gratitude to those times long since passed away, and especially is this feeling awakened in us when we stand astonished before pictures like the Madonnas of Raphael and Holbein, — these purest and most spiritualized, as well as most characteristic works of Italian and German art, — and experience their powerful and silent effect on our hearts. They have indeed been named pearls and gems, but I would rather distinguish them as the "eyes" in the intellectual features of the Dresden Gallery, — this Rachel of collections! Withdraw them — the beaming look is wanting — the mysterious seal of divine beauty has vanished!

The heavens would remain, "and what a heaven, star by star" — but the sun would have disappeared!

The spiritual influence of these pictures returns upon us with ever renewed power, and when we go from their presence, the utterance of our feelings involuntarily glows into a kind of poetical echo of the profound impressions they have left.*

After the removal of the Collection to the New Museum, and after the proposed isolated exhibition of the Sixtine Madonna on a kind of altar, had been carried into effect according to the plans of the Court Architect Krüger, it became the more necessary to provide an equally worthy place for Holbein's Madonna, as the two paintings have ever been considered the gems of the Dresden Gallery.

The first idea was to place this picture also in the cabinet by itself, and in a frame similar to that of the Sixtine Madonna but of smaller dimensions; the first attempt however, proved the difficulty of this arrangement, and the necessity, with figures of such delicate proportions, of arranging a group of kindred subjects, with the Madonna as an appropriate centre.

A sketch with this object in view, was made by the author of this catalogue. The design was based on the historical fact that Holbein's painting had never been used as an altar piece, but, in all probability, found its place among the family pictures adorning the walls of a patrician's house in Basle. It received the Royal approval, and the design was carried out in the best manner, under the superintendence of the author and the Court Architect Krüger, by Mr. Türpe (Cabinet Maker to His Majesty) and Mr. Elmendorff (Carver in Wood) after models by Hauptmann and Hultzsch. It was placed in the cabinet at Easter 1860, and on its panels, besides the central picture by Holbein, are grouped the admirable portrait of Morrett by the same artist; an exquisite female portrait of the same school and character, together with the gem of the Flemish school, viz, the Virgin of Jan van Eyck, and quite recently the magnificent Crucifixion by Albert Dürer.

Purchase of Bagnacavallo's picture 1755.

The Gallery is indebted to the same Giovannini who effected the purchase of the Sixtine Madonna for another work which, although not of the same importance as the first, is nevertheless an excellent one of its kind. This is the imposing altar piece, representing the Madonna and saints, by Bartolomeo Ramenghi, better known as Bagnacavallo. The grandeur and simplicity of its conception, and the vigorous earnestness of its deep and harmonious colouring, can only be thoroughly appreciated since its removal to the rooms of the new Gallery where, it can be seen at a proper distance and its overpowering effect be fully recognized. This picture was originally painted for the Convento de' Pellegrini at Bologna whence it had never been removed, its heavy architectural frame which was built into the wall, seeming destined to imprison it there forever. But the strength of mortar yielded to the power of gold, and the stewards of the monastery agreed to the sale in 1755. In order, however, te avoid remark and not to leave the place unoccupied, one of the conditions of the sale was that some other old picture (!) should be given in exchange. It was not of course, easy to find one of precisely the right dimensions; several additions were, therefore, necessary in order to fill up the space within the frame, and these were executed by Giovannini himself.

Ramenghi's picture cost but 300 Ducati Ungheri (Hungarian ducats) and it is singular that the old picture, which Giovannini does not even consider worthy to be named, together with his own work was reckoned at 400 Hunga. ducats; even with this addition, however, the cost was but small for so fine a picture.

Giovannini as we have seen, died suddenly while still young, June 30 1758, leaving a numerous family in great distress. Count Brühl assisted them with a readiness which does honour to his heart. The poor painter did not, evidently, understand the art, so commonly practised in similar cases, of advancing his own interest while making his purchases for the King. That this art was familiar to Pietro Guarienti (of whose agency we shall have occasion to speak later) is affirmed by his own friends Crespi and Zanetti in their private letters to Count Brühl; and many original bills testify very plainly to Rossi's expertness in this respect.

But even the polished Algarotti must have caused Count Brühl no little trouble by his pretentions, although he was treated by both the King and the Count in every respect as a nobleman, and received at the same time with the royal order* to purchase pictures in Italy for the Gallery, a sum of 1000 Ducats to defray the expenses of the journey, to which similar sums were added from time to time, although his travels extended to no greater a distance from Venice than perhaps to Mantua.

His ambition and vanity were mortified in the highest degree at finding himself excluded from a participation in the purchase of the Modena collection, and the negotiation entrusted to his opponent Rossi who had already supplanted him, much to the pecuniary disadvantage of the court, in the purchase of the pictures in Venice. In his irritation, he wrote Brühl a reproachful letter in which he lays full stress on his old Brescian patent of nobility (his brother was nevertheless a banker in Venice) and his illustrious relatives, and which, notwithstanding its poetical flights, ends with an exact account of all the sums which he had saved for the Saxon court in each separate purchase. The inconsiderable total of these savings on only 21 pictures amounted to 11,900 ducats; he then offers his own private collection for 6000 ducats — of course conspicuously renouncing all personal advantage in the matter, — and asks for an annual salary of only 1,500 ducats and the title of General Intendant of the Royal purchases!

* This order was received in writing from the King through Count Brühl under date of Feb. 16, 1742. On the 30th. March Algarotti writes from Vienna, and at the beginning of April, from Venice with reference to the purchase of the beautiful pictures by Strozzi which the Gallery obtained through his instrumentality.

Brühl's reply declining this offer is a masterpiece of diplomatic courtesy, from which even his most determined enemy could not withhold a tribute of admiration.

Among those who were especially active in making purchases in Italy was also Canon Luigi Crespi, son of the well known painter, Giuseppe Maria Crespi of Bologna, and mention may here be made of his most important purchase, the large painting by Guido Reni, known under the name of Ninus and Semiramis.

Canon Luigi Crespi.

This excellent work of Guido's was in the collection of the Marchese Giov. Nicolo Tanara, had long been in the possession of the family, and was probably painted for them. It was, at that time, supposed to be a representation of Solomon and the queen of Sheba; this designation, however, seems, on closer examination, to be less appropriate than the present one, to the action of the picture and to the persons represented.

Although somewhat damaged, it was nevertheless estimated at a very high value by the owners, and, at first, not less than 10,000 Scudi Romani were demanded for it. The negotiations continued nearly two years, during which time the price materially diminished; but difficulties of another kind arose. The young Marchese Tanara protested against the transaction as being a violation of the right of entailed property, and it required all the clerical influence of our active Canon to obtain the sanction of the Pope to the sale, and to the transport of the picture out of the country. Finally, on the 6th May 1752, the purchase was concluded for the sum of 3000 duc. Ungheri, or 6000 Roman scudi, the careful Crespi having previously obtained a detailed certificate from the Academici Clementini di Bologna confirming the genuineness and excellence of the picture. The original certificate, together with the contract of sale are preserved in the archives of the Gallery.

Among the more important acquisitions by P. Guarienti, must undoubtedly be reckoned the interesting old copy of Raphael's St. Cecilia, which, without any sufficient grounds, was ascribed in our early catalogues to Giulio Romano. For this supposition, there is no justification whatever, either in the intellectual conception of the picture, or the freedom of its treatment. It was, moreover, generally known in Bologna, at that time, to be only a good copy by Dionisio Fiamengo (Dion. Calvaërt, born about 1565 in Antwerp; died 1619) and was purchased in 1750 under that designation. No one, however, took the trouble to search for information concerning it, although all competent judges had long been of opinion that it could only be the work of some Italianized Netherlander. It is now designated by its true name.

* A man, for that time, unusually well acquainted with the history of art, as is shown by his edition of the "Abecedario pittorico" of P. Orlandi, Venice, 1753; which he enriched with valuable notices of the Gallery, and dedicated to King Augustus III.

Purchase of the Predella by Ercole Grandi. 1750.

Two other very rare works and very important of their kind, by Ercole Grandi of Ferrara, a master seldom met with out of Italy, were also acquired through the exertions of Guarienti. These are two pictures forming portions of a predella; one representing the prayer on the Mount of Olives, and the betrayal of Christ; the other, Christ bearing the cross. Both are remarkable for peculiar strength of expression and for earnest and characteristic drawing. They are, evidently, two of the three compositions ("tre storie") which Vasari* mentions as forming

* Vasari I. p. 394 (Bottari Roman Edition). Ben é vero in quel mentre (while he was painting in S. Piero) fece alcune altre cose, e particolarmente, che si sa la predella dell' Altare maggiore di S. Giovanni in monte, nella quale fece tre storie della passione di Christo.

Madonna from the Cardinal d'Amboise in 1508 (?) and that the latter had, in consequence, applied to Raphael, who was at the time painting the picture for Piacenza. Raphael, therefore, made a copy of the picture with the exception of the figure of Sixtus which he exchanged for that of S. Amandus, at whose side he then placed a bishop's mitre and crozier instead of the papal crown of our picture. The painting is said to have been sent to Rouen during Raphael's lifetime. It is of the same size as ours and has recently been lithographed by Aubry le Comte.*

There has been much discussion concerning the genuineness of this picture and its rivalry with our Madonna; but according to the judgment of the best connoisseurs, it seems to be admitted that it will not, in any respect, stand a comparison; and we may add that if it were really a masterpiece, such as exists in this city, it would certainly already have been generally known through excellent reproductions.

In 1857, during a visit in Rouen, I found the above opinion fully confirmed by my own observation. The picture is, evidently, a later copy with the changes already mentioned; a fact which is sufficiently proved by its heavy, reddish brown tone, and an entire want of the refined spirituality which distinguishes the original in every touch of the brush.

It will not be superfluous to mention here one other opinion which was first advanced by a connoisseur of high repute (Bar. von Rumohr), and has since then often been repeated by others, that this splendid picture, from the fact of its having been painted on canvas, was originally destined to be carried in processions.

The circumstance that the picture, contrary indeed to the custom of the time, and to Raphael's own habit, was painted on canvas, cannot alone justify such an assumption, one quite inconsistent with the high position of the great artist, and with the almost idolatrous veneration with which he was regarded by his patron, the Pope, by Rome, by Italy, and by his entire age. With all the value that was at that time attached to everything connected with the ceremonies of the Church, there is no instance, so far as I know, of the employment of so celebrated a master for such work, and if such had really occurred, the painters of the 16th century were possessed of common sense enough to prevent their employing such carefully executed paintings as the one in question for a purpose that would in a short time inevitably have caused their destruction. The age of Leo also was the farthest removed from any such overpious luxury, and would have been the least of all inclined to appropriate such a work to such a purpose. Independent of the fact that canvas was at that time already coming into general use, and could have been new to Raphael only as regards its use in oil painting, since it had been employed from the earliest times for tempera pictures, and, besides the charm of novelty, had undoubted advantages for a picture intended for transport, the very considerable size of the painting is strongly against the supposition that it was intended for processional uses. The opponents of this statement have urged with as much justice as sagacity that with so correct a taste as Raphael possessed, he certainly would not have chosen for a banner, which, even though it were not to float in the wind, must nevertheless be in constant motion, the rectilinear, heavy architectural cornice which forms such an appropriate finish for an altar picture, and harmonizes so well with the structure of the altar itself. But was all this, together with the little angels below, painted at a later date? And by whom?

The simple statement of Vasari also contradicts it: "Fece a monaci neri di S. Sisto in Piacenza la tavola dell' altar maggiore, dentrovi la nostra Donna con S. Sisto e S. Barbara, cosa veramente rarissima e singolare". That Vasari calls the picture, which he may only have seen above the altar, a "tavola" (panel), is, considering the agreement of the description with the picture in other respects, certainly not decisive.

Former condition of the picture.

This great painting has unfortunately not remained untouched by the ravages of time, as was already mentioned in Giovannini's report. But it has suffered still more from the copyists of former times, who, in order to bring out more clearly some obscure parts, made unpardonable use of the most deleterious means; for instance, of frequent rubbing with a mixture of oil and saliva, which produced dirty spots of the worst kind, especially around the head of Madonna.

All these injuries to the picture were removed under a careful restoration by Palmaroli, in 1827, at which time the upper part of the curtain and a part of the glory of angels which had been recklessly turned back, was at length unfolded, and the picture restored to its original size, although, as above mentioned, the observant Giovannini had long before discovered the misfortune, and recommended its correction. Restoration by Palmaroli in 1827

At the end of April or the beginning of May of the year 1754, Giovannini himself brought the Madonna di San Sisto to Dresden, as appears from his letter dated hence May 21, 1754,* and it may be permitted in this place to mention a pleasing tradition connected with the arrival of the picture in this city.

King Augustus, impatient to see again the long expected picture, had ordered its immediate unpacking and exhibition in the palace. When it was brought into the throne room, and there was a momentary hesitation as to placing it in the best light, which happened to be just where the throne stood, the King pushed the latter quickly aside with his own royal hand, exclaiming: — "Make room for the great Raphael!"

Truly, a right royal speech and a testimony to the equality of intellectual greatness and worldly power which does honour both to him and to his age.

* This letter is preserved in the state archives in this city, but it does not mention the exact day of the arrival of the picture. G. left Bologna in Nov. 1753 and went to Piacenza. See my Essay on the Sixtine Madonna in A. v. Zahn's Jahrbüchern, Sept. 1870.

as far as the beginning of this century, and probably had its origin in a remark of Frederick Schlegel's* who may have advanced the idea as an explanation of the circumstance that the Infant in this picture really has a depressed, sickly expression.

But independent of the fact that Holbein and his entire century, far removed, as they were, from a conception so wholly modern, would scarcely have ventured to treat the sacred person of the divine Infant with so much levity, there are numerous other internal reasons for rejecting this assumption. Among the most striking of these, may be mentioned the movement of the hand of the child, undoubtedly raised in the act of blessing: how can this be appropriate to the sick child of the Meyer family? Again, how is to be excused the evidently brotherly caress of the elder boy to the supposed infant Christ, and the childish and even naïve action of the child itself? how to be explained the quiet, typical, almost indifferent manner of all the other members of the family under such extraordinary circumstances? Ever new contradictions, which are only increased on closer examination, speak decidedly against the correctness of this not unpoetical explanation.

The fact noticeable more or less, in almost all early German representations of similar subjects, that the Infant is less successfully treated than the mother and other figures, has apparently given rise to this interpretation of the picture.

* Herr von Quandt mentions a paper by Luden that has the same idea.

while the natural explanation of the fact lies, in our opinion, in the real difficulty of the task; and in the want of study of beautiful forms and of the antique; added to which, the restless movements of the little models sufficiently account for some want of success, even with such a master as Holbein. The youngest child of Meyer, whom the artist saw in person before him, and to whom he was not required to lend any ideal characteristics or movement, was therefore the more successful work.

Holbein's picture belongs, in its conception, entirely to the earliest class of similar representations, inasmuch as the kneeling family is depicted as literally under the mantle of the Virgin, (see the shoulder of the elder Meyer) "as a brood under the mother's wings", in accordance with the type of the protecting Madonna, who is often represented in older pictures with the civil and ecclesiastical authorities of whole cities under her mantle. After the Reformation, the crucified and risen Saviour took the place of the Madonna, and we often see, especially in connection with monumental representations in churches, biblical subjects of symbolical meaning, e. g. the elevation of the brazen serpent; the raising of Lazarus etc. In such instances, the family are generally in the foreground of the picture, painted mostly on a much smaller scale; but the kneeling posture, and the rigid separation of sexes as in our Holbein, are always observed.*

* The Cocina Family, the magnificent picture by Paolo Veronese, is also a repetition of this typical idea in the Italian style, and in a still freer artistic form.

Mr. Hubert Morrett by Holbein.

One other work by the same master, forming, like this family picture, a culminating point of its kind among single portraits, must be mentioned here — the exquisite portrait of Mr. Hubert Morrett, Goldsmith to Henry VIII of England. It offers, at the same time, an opportunity to the historian of the Gallery to give a striking example of uncertainty concerning the names of authors.

The picture came into our Gallery with the Modena purchase, as if the best works even of German Art could, at that time, only come from Italy, and it was considered as a work of Leonardo da Vinci's.*

At a later period, it was supposed that there were good grounds for considering it to be a portrait of Ludovico Sforza, named il Moro.

* It cannot, however, be denied that the authorship of Leonardo was by no means assumed in Modena itself, at least in former times, with so much certainty as it appears to have been in our catalogue of the Modena pictures. On the contrary, the well known work of Scannelli (Microcosmo Ediz. di 1657, (p. 266) contains, under the name of "Olbeno" (Holbein), a description of a picture in the Modena collection which evidently can be no other than our Morrett. This is a circumstance to which Cav. Discar, an art critic of Modena, in a paper addressed to the Directors of our Gallery in 1860, especially calls their attention. We may add to this remark that in the same work of Scannelli, in the passage which particularly refers to the works of Leonardo in the Modena purchase, no picture is mentioned which in any respect resembles that in our Gallery. Scannelli on the contrary, speaks only of a half-length figure of Saint Catharine, and the head of a youth in armour, as works by Leonardo da Vinci.

Thus it was designated until Rumohr first named the younger Holbein as the painter of the picture, and von Quandt in an excellent essay (see Kunstbl. 1846, No. 9) convincingly pointed out the person represented.

It is a singular circumstance that even in this night of error a spark of truth was left glimmering, in the preservation of the syllable "Mor".

Out of Morrett, probably the word Morus was first formed (Thomas Morus, who was always first thought of in connection with any unknown portrait by Holbein; as was the case with the family Meyer which was supposed to be the family of Morus, as already mentioned); but in Italy, Morus naturally became Moro.

But who in Italy knew any other Moro than the great Sforza? and who could have painted him except his great countryman, Leonardo? — a portrait withal so exquisite in execution, so perfectly finished, even to the hair!

With respect to any chronological doubt, there was no very accurate examination into the subject; the portrait became that of Ludovico Sforza, painted by Leonardo da Vinci, and thus it remained, as has been said, until a revived acquaintance with the German School restored his work to the honest Basle artist, and, after further research, the likeness of the old goldsmith was found again in an engraving by W. Hollar.

If, nevertheless, the evidence as to the authorship of Holbein afforded by Hollar's certainly very imperfect and superficial engraving might be considered insufficient by some particularly unbelieving souls, all doubt is henceforth at an end, since the discovery of the beautiful original drawing of Holbein for our picture. It was found at the sale of the pictures of the Art Dealer, Samuel Woodburne, in London, and purchased through the instrumentality of Dir. L. Gruner in 1860, and since that time has been placed in the Holbein room for the examination and conviction of all interested.

Acquisition of the Sixtine Madonna.

We must now refer to the purchase of a work which, in consideration of its extraordinary artistic value, and of its celebrity, should have taken precedence of any other picture; but a due regard for chronological order, as well as its undeniable inner relationship with the previously mentioned Madonna by Holbein, furnish us here with the most suitable opportunity for its discussion. We refer to the acquisition of the celebrated Sixtine Madonna, the gem of the Dresden Gallery.

This work of Raphael's, painted in his best period, the only one in oil that for grandeur of conception and thoroughly intellectual freedom in execution stands fully on the same level as those grandest creations of Christian art, his cartoons for tapestry, was painted, as Vasari informs us, for the principal altar of the Black Friars' Monastery of San Sisto in Piacenza. There it remained until seen with enthusiastic admiration by Augustus III., when still Crown Prince, on a journey to Italy in 1711—12, at which time he already formed a resolution to possess himself of it if possible.

But not until forty years later, in 1754, did he succeed, through the agency of the painter Carlo Cesare Giovannini, in obtaining it. This artist, (born in Parma 1695, resided in Bologna from 1723, and died June 30, 1758) after a careful examination of the condition of the painting, and a detailed report concerning it, effected its purchase for the Dresden Gallery for 20,000 ducats, or 40,000 Roman scudi.*

A copy of the picture of the original size was also stipulated for in the sale; this was painted by the Venetian artist Nogari and, as usual, is said to be still considered as the original in the monastery.

A painting, similar to ours, exists in Rouen. It is related that an abbess of the Abbey S. Amand in that city had begged a picture of the

* A copy of the report of Giovannini concerning a careful examination of the picture in which he was assisted by Dottore Abbate Giov. Batt. Bianconi of Piacenza lies before us; the original is, according to a note at the end, in the possession of Gaetano Giordani in Bologna.

Giovannini had caused the picture to be taken down from the altar, and expresses first his opinion as to the undoubted genuineness of the painting, which was in fact "cosa veramente rarissima e singolare", as Vasari had already remarked. He found but few defective places in the vesture, and dark spots on the body of the Child, which were occasioned by a too thick coating of lasur (?) varnish here and there, by the master himself. The picture had suffered more from dryness, as it been standing undisturbed on the altar for more than 200 years. He also discovered that the upper part of the canvas had been turned back, and advised that this should be remedied immediately on its arrival in Dresden.

Madonna from the Cardinal d'Amboise in 1508 (?) and that the latter had, in consequence, applied to Raphael, who was at the time painting the picture for Piacenza. Raphael, therefore, made a copy of the picture with the exception of the figure of Sixtus which he exchanged for that of S. Amandus, at whose side he then placed a bishop's mitre and crozier instead of the papal crown of our picture. The painting is said to have been sent to Rouen during Raphael's lifetime. It is of the same size as ours and has recently been lithographed by Aubry le Comte.*

There has been much discussion concerning the genuineness of this picture and its rivalry with our Madonna; but according to the judgment of the best connoisseurs, it seems to be admitted that it will not, in any respect, stand a comparison; and we may add that if it were really a masterpiece, such as exists in this city, it would certainly already have been generally known through excellent reproductions.

In 1857, during a visit in Rouen, I found the above opinion fully confirmed by my own observation. The picture is, evidently, a later copy with the changes already mentioned; a fact which is sufficiently proved by its heavy, reddish brown tone, and an entire want of the refined spirituality which distinguishes the original in every touch of the brush.

It will not be superfluous to mention here one other opinion which was first advanced by a connoisseur of high repute (Bar. von Rumohr), and has since then often been repeated by others, that this splendid picture, from the fact of its having been painted on canvas, was originally destined to be carried in processions.

The circumstance that the picture, contrary indeed to the custom of the time, and to Raphael's own habit, was painted on canvas, cannot alone justify such an assumption, one quite inconsistent with the high position of the great artist, and with the almost idolatrous veneration with which he was regarded by his patron, the Pope, by Rome, by Italy, and by his entire age. With all the value that was at that time attached to everything connected with the ceremonies of the Church, there is no instance, so far as I know, of the employment of so celebrated a master for such work, and if such had really occurred, the painters of the 16th century were possessed of common sense enough to prevent their employing such carefully executed paintings as the one in question for a purpose that would in a short time inevitably have caused their destruction. The age of Leo also was the farthest removed from any such overpious luxury, and would have been the least of all inclined to appropriate such a work to such a purpose. Independent of the fact that canvas was at that time already coming into general use, and could have been new to Raphael only as regards its use in oil painting, since it had been employed from the earliest times for tempera pictures, and, besides the charm of novelty, had undoubted advantages for a picture intended for transport, the very considerable size of the painting is strongly against the supposition that it was intended for processional uses. The opponents of this statement have urged with as much justice as sagacity that with so correct a taste as Raphael possessed, he certainly would not have chosen for a banner, which, even though it were not to float in the wind, must nevertheless be in constant motion, the rectilinear, heavy architectural cornice which forms such an appropriate finish for an altar picture, and harmonizes so well with the structure of the altar itself. But was all this, together with the little angels below, painted at a later date? And by whom?

The simple statement of Vasari also contradicts it: "Fece a monaci neri di S. Sisto in Piacenza la tavola dell' altar maggiore, dentrovi la nostra Donna con S. Sisto e S. Barbara, cosa veramente rarissima e singolare". That Vasari calls the picture, which he may only have seen above the altar, a "tavola" (panel), is, considering the agreement of the description with the picture in other respects, certainly not decisive.

Former condition of the picture.

This great painting has unfortunately not remained untouched by the ravages of time, as was already mentioned in Giovannini's report. But it has suffered still more from the copyists of former times, who, in order to bring out more clearly some obscure parts, made unpardonable use of the most deleterious means; for instance, of frequent rubbing with a mixture of oil and saliva, which produced dirty spots of the worst kind, especially around the head of Madonna.

All these injuries to the picture were removed under a careful restoration by Palmaroli, in 1827, at which time the upper part of the curtain and a part of the glory of angels which had been recklessly turned back, was at length unfolded, and the picture restored to its original size, although, as above mentioned, the observant Giovannini had long before discovered the misfortune, and recommended its correction. Restoration by Palmaroli in 1827

At the end of April or the beginning of May of the year 1754, Giovannini himself brought the Madonna di San Sisto to Dresden, as appears from his letter dated hence May 21, 1754,* and it may be permitted in this place to mention a pleasing tradition connected with the arrival of the picture in this city.

King Augustus, impatient to see again the long expected picture, had ordered its immediate unpacking and exhibition in the palace. When it was brought into the throne room, and there was a momentary hesitation as to placing it in the best light, which happened to be just where the throne stood, the King pushed the latter quickly aside with his own royal hand, exclaiming: — "Make room for the great Raphael!"

as a youthful production of Leonardo, and, as such, as a work of the highest value. When the picture arrived in this city, the Gallery Committee were also unanimously of this opinion and it scarcely needed the farther confirmation which was afterwards most unexpectedly found, although this rendered any subsequent doubt all but impossible. A drawing was found quite by chance in the Cabinet of Drawings, in this city, which proved to be the study for the Madonna in the above mentioned picture; this drawing has from time immemorial belonged to the collection under the name of Leonardo, and like the picture itself fully corresponds in its character to this name.

The relation between this valuable drawing which is in pencil and on parchment, and the picture in the Gallery was also acknowledged by the Gallery Committee after a careful examination and comparison of the two at a meeting Febr. 1. 1861, at which Director L. Gruner was also present. As already remarked, this circumstantial, and by no means unimportant, evidence was scarcely necessary in presence of the striking internal proofs of the excellence of the picture which must of themselves remove all doubt, in the minds of connoisseurs as to the authorship of the work.

Who besides Leonardo da Vinci, it may confidently be asked, could at that time (about 1470), have produced a picture of such grandeur of arrangement, such depth of feeling and grace, combined with such astonishing breadth of execution? Look, for instance, at the vase at the side of the bed, scarcely to be seen with the unaided eye; and at the wonderful delicacy in the execution of the landscape, almost surpassing that of van Eyck and Memlingk, if not in picturesqueness, at least in drawing. It is moreover characterised by a classic beauty of arrangement, a high ideality in the little head of the Madonna, and a depth of feeling in the adoring St. John, such as are rarely to be found in the works of any period. That the great Florentine should, in his later works, have surpassed his earlier efforts, no more diminishes the value of this picture of his youth than could the contemplation of the Sixtine Madonna, the work of the mature artist, lessen the interest with which we look at the Sposalizio, the production of Raphael's younger years. The charm of the modest bud is not diminished by the side of the full blown rose.

It may therefore well be considered as a fortunate circumstance that the Dresden Gallery was thus once more enriched by the great name of Leonardo, which had been wanting there, since the magnificent portrait of Morrett was justly restored to its author, Hans Holbein the Younger.

The Gallery is also indebted to his late Majesty for the present of two pictures left by Her Royal Highness, Princess Louise (who died in Rome), which are mentioned in the catalogue; also for the recent acquisition of a highly interesting picture of the early German school. This is, evidently, a copy of the celebrated engraving of Albr. Dürer, and represents the kneeling St. Hubert, at the moment when the miraculous stag, with the crucifix between his horns, appears before him. In addition to the great artistic value of the picture, and the rarity of such representations in our Gallery, it is connected with the collection by historical associations which render its acquisition the more desirable and interesting.

An inscription on the back of the picture, coupled with several other historical proofs, makes it highly probable that it formerly belonged to the Gallery in Hubertsburg, the favourite chateau of Augustus III. It may have been carried away in 1761, during the Seven Years' War and exactly a hundred years later, it returned to the original owner, by purchase from Prof. Th. von Oer, whose property it had become, and who, with praiseworthy disinterestedness, sold it for 128 Thalers, the trifling sum which he had paid for it.

The most important of the recent acquisitions are: — 1st an admirable landscape by C. Poussin, unique of its kind in respect of its delicate execution and truth to nature. It was purchased in 1862 for £ 250, from Mr. Alexander Allen; 2nd. A picture of great merit by Cäsar van Everdingen, whose works are rare even in Holland, representing Bacchus, Pomona and Flora, was purchased in 1865, for 25 Louisd'or, of Conservator J. D. Dreyer of Bremen, 3d. The most valuable, however, of the recent additions is undoubtedly the unrivalled picture of Christ on the Cross by Albrecht Dürer, purchased in 1865 for 4400 florins, at the sale by auction of the pictures of the late Jos. Daniel Böhm, Engraver in the Imperial Mint in Vienna.

Since 1873, in consequence of an important increase of the funds appropriated to the purchase of paintings, a number of works by both old and modern masters have been added to the Gallery. These are mentioned in the supplement to the catalogue.

We have perhaps devoted too much time for the taste of most of our readers, to the subject of these acquisitions; and yet there are losses as well as additions to be recorded in connection with the fortunes of so important a collection. These, happily, in the present case are not numerous.

One of the greatest privations mentioned in the extant documents, is the sale of 132 paintings, mostly by Cranach and other early German masters. They had not actually been incorporated in the Collection, and were transferred to the often mentioned Herr von Heineken, June 21. 1756, for 7900 Thalers, a sum which had been previously paid by him.*

Pictures still more valuable than the above, seem to have been disposed of in 1796, at an auction which Count Marcolini, at that time General Director of the various collections, ordered to be held for the sale of duplicates only. This circumstance is much to be regretted, yet in comparison with the number of pictures in the collection, the sale seems, fortunately, not to have been very important, the disapprobation of all patriots and lovers of art soon causing the auctions to be discontinued*.

The greatest loss, in every respect, was occasioned by the destruction of the magnificent chateau of Hubertsburg in 1760, in which the collection of paintings was entirely destroyed, scarcely half a dozen, according to J. A. Riedel's account, being saved and these only in the most pitiable condition. How large the collection must have been, may be imagined from the fact that in 1750, one hundred and ninety pictures were put aside as copies or duplicates.

But treasures so celebrated, and so universally admired could not fail to tempt the cupidity of the robber, and we accordingly find, in the archives accounts of several thefts. With the exception of some of minor importance, the stolen pictures were however speedily recovered.

* It is related that among the pictures sold, there were some large Canalettos, of which there is no want in the Gallery; and further that Prof. Darnstedt, a celebrated landscape engraver, was one of those who were particularly successful in their efforts to stop the sales, which were said to have yielded only the insignificant sum of 679 Thalers.

 According to the old inventory of 1722 and following years:

Nr. 174. Schubert Cop.: St. Laurence on the gridiron, was stolen by the sentry in 1723.

„ 126. Martin Olif (?) orig. Suabian peasants sitting at table, (one of a series by this unknown master of seven pictures representing Suabian life); stolen from the Riesensaal, also in 1723.

The robbery perpetrated in 1788 by a certain Wogas under circumstances bordering on romantic, acquired, later, such notoriety that it served as the subject of a novel*. This circumstance may perhaps justify a more detailed account of the facts, taken from a report by Dr. Christian Hauschild (Kammer-Commissions-Rath) which was translated into Italian for Count Marcolini.

On the 22nd of Oct. 1788, Joh. Ant. Riedel, at that time Inspector, reported to Count Marcolini, his superior in office, the distressing fact that in the previous unusually stormy night, a grated window in the Gallery had been broken through by a daring robber, and the following pictures stolen:

1st. The celebrated Magdalene by Correggio.
2nd. The Judgment of Paris by van der Werff.
3rd. The Head of an old man with hat and white feather by Seybold.

Nr. 1809. Rotenhammer: Diana's Bath, stolen under Inspector Demiani.

Another passage in J. A. Riedels's Diary for 1747, mentions the theft of the following pictures by the fire watch who kept the keys of the room containing the reserved pictures:

"A man at a table, smoking tobacco, by Franz van Mieris; and two small ordinary pictures representing persons in conversation, by Xavier."

The first of these pictures seems to have been recovered, as one fully corresponding to the description is still in the Gallery.

* Likenesses of Wogas are found in four different etchings.

 So Riedel described it in the excitement of the moment; the one referred to is the Portrait of an old man with a spotted fur cap. See Catalogue.

Count Marcolini immediately ordered an advertisement to be printed and posted everywhere, promising a reward of one thousand ducats to anyone who should return the pictures.

A circumstance mentioned in the report is remarkable as characteristic of the period, and seems almost comical admidst the general consternation. In the midst of his anxiety, Riedel received an anonymous letter dated from Gera, Oct. 29, in which the writer earnestly urges that these words:

Agmoet, melach, Aglat, Aglat, Delay.

should be placed over the door and broken window of the Gallery as a sure means of causing the thief to return the stolen pictures!

It was, however unnecessary to test the infallibility of this supernatural device, the promise of a reward had already produced better results. At 4 o'clock in the morning of the 26th, a poor lamplighter, while extinguishing the lamps on the way leading to the Zwingerwall, found a small box containing the pictures by van der Werff and Seybold, together with an anonymous letter directed to His Serene Highness the Elector, "to be opened with his own hand", which he immediately carried to the main guard-house in the neighborhood.

The anonymous writer of the letter demanded that the promised reward of one thousand ducats should be deposited in an appointed place, a hole near a milestone on a pathway leading across the fields to Hecht's vineyard and the forest beyond the Schwarzen Thor

Black Gate — in Neustadt, after which the third picture, Correggio's Magdalene, would be found on the same spot.

Truly, a clumsy stratagem and one which could not fail of leading to the discovery of the thief, to which end it was in fact skilfully employed.

A small box containing an ambiguous reply was deposited in the appointed place which was strictly watched by foresters.

In the meantime, it had been ascertained that a certain Wogaz* had spoken with another person concerning the printed advertisement, and had, on that occasion, made very particular inquires as to the value of the precious stones in the frame of the Magdalene, and as to the possibility of selling them. This circumstance was the more suspicions as Wogaz was generally considered to be a man of bad character, and had already been tried for stealing bee-hives, moreover, lived in the immediate neighborhood of the above mentioned milestone.

The grounds for suspecting Wogaz multiplied and when an opportunity occurred for requiring a receipt, under his own hand, for some military transports previously carried out by him, the similarity of the hand writing to that of the anonymous letter accompanying the two pictures, removed all further doubt.

Wogaz and his family were arrested on the 8th of November. The crafty thief stoutly denied everything, and made every possible evasion, but when, after a careful search through his house, the picture of the Magdalene was placed before him, he fainted, and afterwards made a full confession.

He had hidden the picture so carefully in the hayloft of his house, which had apparently been arranged for the reception of stolen articles, that it was not found until a second careful search had been made; it was then discovered with other articles purloined from churches and individuals, under the boards of the floor near the chimney.

In the same place lay also the larger gilt frame, and the small silver one, together with the precious stones broken out of the frame which they had adorned, and which no doubt had particularly excited the cupidity of the unhappy culprit.

A second public advertisement quieted the apprehensions of all lovers of art, and of the excited public in general lest such an exquisite work, unique of its kind, was lost forever. The costly frame, however, the probable cause of the robbery, was subsequently withdrawn from the painting*.

The thefts committed by Wogas in Uebigau, in the Cabinet of Natural Curiosities, in the Catholic Church, and in the Kunstkammer, now also came to light. From the last mentioned room, he had purloined a silver stag with a figure of Diana, and a Cupid in silver. These he had unfortunately broken up and melted, and with the proceeds had paid the debts on his property. Had he succeeded in disposing of the fruits of his last robbery, he would have carrried out his expressed intention of selling all his property and of emigrating to America. He was sentenced to 14 years imprisonment in the House of correction at Zwickau, where he died May 6. 1797.

Another record by the same Inspector, J. A. Riedel, of Aug. 27. 1810, mentions the disappearance of a small portrait in Holbein's style which, notwithstanding the most careful search, was never found, and subsequently omitted from the Catalogue. In consequence of this theft, all the smaller pictures were afterwards fastened more firmly to the wall; but in spite of all precautions, another robbery occurred in 1849, when a small but valuable picture by Gabriel Metzu was, with great adroitness and in broad daylight, stolen by a woman* who fortunately exhibited but little cunning in disposing of it, as the picture which had already been particularly described in the newspapers, was offered for sale by her in Leipzig where she was arrested, and the picture recovered.

Seven Years' War, a good Genius seems to have presided over the fortunes of the Gallery, as the Report of the often mentioned J. A. Riedel speaks of but five pictures which suffered any injury* (most of the collection, including the best paintings, had been sent to Königstein in Sept. 1759, after the capitulation of Dresden) although a bombshell, and several 6—8 lbs. cannon balls, besides large fragments of shells which exploded on the Frauenkirche, penetrated into the Gallery.

The pictures which were transported to Königstein also suffered some injury from remaining so long packed in boxes in a place not perfectly secure from dampness, but this was soon remedied as far as was possible.

* The injured pictures were: 1. A Flower piece by Mignon; 2. A painting by Lancret; 3. A Hare by Weenix; 4. Altar piece by Torelli; 5. The large painting by Silvestre.

 A period still more recent, and more fraught with danger, the year 1849, passed with but little injury to the Gallery, owing principally to the self sacrificing exertions of the Privy Counsellor, Dr. H. W. Schulz (who died while still in the prime of life) and of several of the Gallery officials; so that, although the pictures received many injuries, none of these were too serious to prevent all visible traces of them from being subsequently removed.

 A most interesting diary kept by Riedel (extract for 1744—60) who, during this eventful period, proved himself to be a faithful guardian of the treasures intrusted to his care, mentions that on the 29th of August 1756, as the Prussians were approaching the city, he was ordered to carry the Magdalene of Correggio, which had previously hung

To what extent these years of strife, so productive of misery for Saxony, checked the heretofore rapid growth of the Gallery, is shown by the circumstance, among many others, that soon after the close of the war, an English Art Dealer by the name of Gaven presented a large unpaid account for pictures furnished by him.* It was found, however, on a careful examination into the matter, that most of the pictures mentioned in his account had never been delivered at all, and those actually in the Gallery, for which, indeed, he was still unpaid, had been so injured by sea-water in the transport from England that they were by no means worth the high price demanded for them. in the bed chamber of His Majesty into that of the Queen, who also took charge of a sealed packet containing the keys of the Gallery. On the 23rd of Nov. 1756, after the entry of the Prussian garrison, King Frederick II. and the Princes Henry and Ferdinand of Prussia, whith a numerous suite, visited the Gallery. On the occasion of a second visit, the King ordered of the court painter Dietrich a copy of Battoni's Magdalene, without the skull, which was delivered to him March 17, 1757, at his headquarters in the Brühl palace by Her Majesty's High Steward, and Riedel. After the death of the Queen which occurred not long afterwards, the keys of the Gallery and the Magdalene were delivered to His Royal Highness the Electoral Prince.

* According to his own statement, he had purchased the pictures from the collections of the Cardinals Ottoboni and Cibo, and besides a Raphael, not particularly described, he mentioned more especially an original by Guido, representing the Archangel Michael.

visable ,therefore, at a time when the resources of the country were so completely exhausted, that these pictures should be returned to their rightful owner.

We may here, in a few words, refer to the auctions at which within a few years the least valuable of the pictures among the „Reserve" have been sold. The first of these began Oct. 17, 1859, and about 200 pictures were disposed of for a total of 2178 Thlr. The second sale took place April 16, 1860, and the following days, and the same number of pictures were disposed of for 2784 Thlr. The third was held on the 13th of May 1861, and the following days, when 166 pictures were sold for 3478 Thlr.

It is gratifying to remark that the so-called "Reserve", which consisted partly of pictures without value, and partly of such as were not suitable for exhibition, was in this manner finally disposed of, to the great advantage of the Gallery, as the proceeds of the sales increased the means of making new acquisitions.

On this occasion a large number of the better pictures among those which had previously formed the "Reserve" and some of which were of considerable value, were transferred to the Gallery. Of this number were; — the fine picture of Hero and Leander, from the school of Rubens, the principal figure of which is certainly by the master's own hand; the Marriage at Cana, a valuable painting by Jan Steen, one in every respect superior to the only work by this master previously possessed by the Gallery; and the Gypsy by Caravaggio, a painting worthy of a place among the best productions of this master in our collection. Besides these there were some small paintings by Dutch masters, viz; a Magdalene by Mieris; a female singer by Slingelandt, and landscapes by Mans and Griffier; a Flower piece by Rachel Ruysch; works by rare masters who had not been previously represented in the Gallery e. g. Battle pieces by Esaias van de Velde; Medusa by Victor Wolfvoet; landscapes by J. Looten, an imitator of Hobbema, and by Jan Peeters, a scholar of Teniers, etc.

Although the most flourishing period for in the growth of the Gallery had now passed, it was proposed to devote increasing care to the preservation of its treasures. It was, of course, impossible then to profit by an experience acquired only later, and often after great sacrifice. The exhibition rooms of picture Galleries at that time, as was previously the case in the Italian collections, were almost universally unprovided with any means of heating during the winter. In our climate so different from that of Italy, such a circumstance could not but entail the most fatal consequences.

An annual temperature varying from a heat in summer frequently rising as high as 20° Reaumur, to a cold in winter sometimes reaching an equal number of degrees below the freezing point must necessarily have had a very deleterious effect on the sensitive panel pictures and on the smooth varnished surface of paintings generally, which readily imbibe all moisture from the atmosphere. In addition to this, was one calamity peculiar to Dresden, where the consumption of coal constantly becoming more general, fills the atmosphere with a thick cloud of floating particles of soot which find an entrance through the most carefully closed windows into the rooms of every building.

In consideration of these circumstances it became more and more apparent that for the preservation of the pictures it was imperatively necessary to take measures for their thorough and careful restoration, to which but little attention had hitherto been devoted*.

As early as 1808, and from that time forward until 1825, the condition of the Gallery, and the urgent necessity of a restoration of the principal pictures had been the subject of public remark and warning. The government, and the directors of the Gallery, after mature consideration, were finally induced to invite from Rome Palmaroli, the most celebrated restorer of pictures of that time, to undertake the cleaning and restoration of the best paintings.

* The court painters Benedict Kern, Dietrich, and the Inspector Riedel, had heretofore attended to the restoration of the paintings. Dietrich was well known for the recklessness with which, although not without skill as a restorer, he actually painted over the injured places in the pictures with utter disregard of the original.

 Xavier de Burtin: Traité des connaissances, etc. Chap. De la galérie Royale à Dresde. Paris, 1808. Also, J. G. v. Quandt, in several articles in the Kunstblatt, all of which are written with the patriotic zeal for the interests of the Gallery which always characterized that excellent man.

He commenced his labours Aug. 25, 1826, with one of the most difficult tasks, viz; the Madonna with SS. Peter, George and Bruno, by Garofalo, a painting which had received many injuries, but which was restored by him in the most satisfactory manner. Then followed the restoration of a number of the best paintings among which was the Sixtine Madonna of Raphael. With regard to his success in the restoration of this picture, opinions, as is usual in such cases, have differed. Fortunately, only those parts of the painting which had been already mentioned in Giovannini's report, required restoration, for the rest of the picture a slight cleaning alone was needful.*

* Palmaroli, who had brought his son with him from Rome to assist him in his labours, received per day, a so-called Louis neuf or Carolin (monthly 187 Thlr.); to which was added a sum sufficient for his board and house rent, and in the latter part of the time, a monthly bonus of 40 Thlr.; his journey from Rome and back was, each time, reimbursed with 300 Thlr., and when his sojourn which, it was at first supposed, would be limited to a few months, was finally prolonged through the winter, the politic Italian demanded an additional sum sufficient to provide winter clothing for himself and his son, fuel, and even pocket money, in which the outlay for theatre tickets was expressly mentioned. At the termination of his stay in Dresden which extended from June 1826 to the end of August 1827, the sums paid to him amounted to 5518 Thlr. exclusive of several hundred thalers expended for materials. It is certain that for the restoration of the "Night" at least, he received more money than Correggio did for painting the original picture, the sum which the latter received being as was affirmed, Palmaroli was particularly skilful in lining injured pictures with new canvas (Rentoilage). This, as well as many other ingenious processes in art, was soon acquired by persons connected with the Gallery, who afterwards succeeded, in many cases, even in transferring paintings to entirely new canvas. After Palmaroli had finished his work, a continual examination of the pictures was found to be necessary for the discovery and removal of all injuries and blemishes.

The conscientious preservation, as far as possible, of the original painting; the strict limitation of the restoration to the defect itself; the choice of the best methods of treatment, and of the most durable colours; in short, the principles to be observed in the restoration of paintings as a distinct branch of art, were by degrees perfected into a system, now practically employed in all large collections. In our Gallery this difficult work has, for a long time, been executed with great zeal and often with surprising success by the Inspectors Renner (died 1869) and Schirmer, who were appointed for the only 140 Thlr. courant. Palmaroli however worked with diligence and skill and in this comparatively short time, he restored most satisfactorily no fewer than 54 paintings, some of which were very large. A present of 50 ducats from the privy purse of the King, together with the adjudication to him of the large Gold Medal for Art etc. best showed the appreciation which his services received. During his stay in the city, besides the Gallery pictures, Palmaroli also restored the great altar piece by Menge, and two smaller altar pictures by the same master in the Catholic Church.

purpose, and by whom all the arts of preservation have been perseveringly employed against the injurious effects of the climate, the sooty particles in the atmosphere and the destructive influence of time.

One other most effective preservative against these evils, although often very disturbing to the spectator, is the employment of panes of glass, which within a few years have been placed before the best pictures, and those which require the most care. These will no doubt in the future be found to afford the best protection, and are the more necessary if we consider that pictures, like human beings, require the more careful attention the older they become. But the rooms of the old Gallery no longer admitted of an exhibition of the pictures satisfactory to the requirements of modern times. In the days of former magnificence, paintings were chiefly considered as forming a necessary part of decoration or even furniture of the lofty and splendid apartments of princes, but the growing veneration for these treasures of art which from their greater age were constantly increasing both in value and susceptibility to injury demanded that rooms should be provided for them well adapted to their exhibition, inspection and preservation.

The complaints of native and foreign friends of Art* as to the inadequacy of the old Gallery building to meet these requirements became more and more numerous; but it was due to the discernment and true love of art of King Frederick Augustus that finally in 1845, decisive preparatory steps were taken for the erection of a new building; these received the sanction of the King and Parliament.

Various sites were proposed for the new Museum; among others the Stallwiese in Neustadt, near the so-called Pontonschuppen (pontoon sheds) opposite the Brühl Terrace; while even the Japanese Palace was not without its partisans; but after mature deliberation a plot of ground was chosen next to the Zwinger, the enclosure of which was completed by the new building, and to which its original character as the entrance court to a palace was thus restored. It already contained the Cabinets of Engravings and of Natural Curiosities, the Historical Museum, and the Mathematical Collection, and with the addition of the Collection of Plaster Casts, (the so-called Mengs Museum) the selection of this site secured the great advantage of uniting all the Collections in one complete whole: a Collection of Collections. The task imposed on the architect, of designing a new building which should agree in style with the old galleries and pavilions of the Zwinger was so skilfuly executed by Semper that a perfect harmony between the two was found to be not incompatible with modern requirements.

The building was begun in 1847, according to the plans of Prof. G. Semper, at that time Director of the Academy of Architecture (Bauschule) in this city; and after 1849 it was continued under the direction of Landbaumeister Hänel, and Hofbaumeister Krüger assisted by Amtsbauverwalter Beuchelt, and notwithstanding some interruptions, was finished with the exception of the interior arrangements, in 1854.

The New Museum is in its ground plan a parallelogram, the form best adapted to the convenient exhibition and preservation of pictures, and one which has therefore been adopted in most of the great galleries. The two principal fronts face very nearly north and south; the entire length including the slightly projecting wings at each end is 225 Dresden ells (about 420 English feet,) with a breadth of 52 ells (97 feet). The height of the main building is 43 ells (about 80 feet); to the top of the dome, 57 ells (about 106 feet).

The effect of the building is materially increased by an archway in the centre nearly 20 ells (about 37 feet) in height, richly ornamented with sculptures, and forming a vaulted passage, in three divisions, by which the cupola is supported. Besides the two stories visible from the outside, the building contains a third, 9 ells (about 17 feet) high, by the side of the principal halls, and directly over the corridor on the north side; this is lighted from above. The eastern division of the ground floor was set apart for the reception of the Mengs Museum of Plaster Casts, while the western half contains the main entrance, the staircase leading to the Picture Gallery, and with its handsome pillars of granite and Wildenfels marble forms a worthy introduction to the Museum. The Cabinet of Engravings is directly opposite the entrance doors, where the stairs turn off to the left, and on the right are the collection of pictures in coloured crayons, the paintings of Canaletto and Dietrich, and the rooms devoted to the restoration of paintings.

In the upper story of the Gallery properly so-called, the centre room which is arranged for the reception of the tapestries, produces an imposing effect, being raised above the general level and lighted by a glass dome more than 32 ells (60 feet) from the floor. Connected with this on either side by short flights of steps are the principal halls of the Gallery 24 ells (45 feet) in height and lighted from above.

The paintings of the Italian schools have been arranged in the halls towards the west end, those of the Flemish and German schools, connected with the former by the Spanish and Neapolitan schools, are arranged on the eastern side. At each end of the building, are three smaller rooms with side light which lead from the three large halls to a corridor occupying the entire length of the building, and divided by partitions into 21 cabinets with side light, chiefly intended for the exhibition of smaller pictures which require a stronger light. The paintings are so arranged in the cabinets as to correspond as nearly as possible with the schools in the adjoining halls where the larger paintings by the same masters are to be found.

At the sides of the Cupola Saloon, two flights of steps, which unite near the top, lead to the third story above mentioned. This embraces, besides the centre room into which the staircase leads, sixteen other rooms of various sizes all lighted from above.

The simple yet imposing architecture of all the rooms, the advantageous distribution of light from the skylights, and the fine proportions of the walls, produce a striking and pleasing effect on the visitor.

The happy idea of raising the centre room above the others, contributes materially to this effect, as it opens the most picturesque views both from and into the side halls and affords points of view from which the pictures may be seen at the greatest and most advantageous distances.

With the exception of some trifling and perhaps unavoidable inconveniences, there are certainly few Galleries which offer greater advantages of arrangement; an opinion which during the time since it was opened to the public (Sept. 25, 1855) has been abundantly confirmed.

In the preliminary consultations concerning the distribution and hanging of the paintings in the new rooms; in the decisions with regard to the employment of the hall of the cupola for the exhibition of the Raphael and Flemish tapestries, and in all other important resolutions, the Gallery Commission* have taken an active

* The Gallery Commission (appointed by Royal order Sept. 4. 1836, at the commencement of the preparations for the new building,) consisted of the Privy Counsellor Dr. H. W. Schulz (who died in the part, and their views could the more readily be adopted by the Director to whom, with the assistance of the Inspectors, the duty of hanging the pictures was assigned; as the Director of the Gallery was ex officio chairman of the Commission.

The difficult task of transporting and hanging the pictures, together with all the other necessary arrangements, were successfully carried through during the short time between May 31, and Sept. 25, so that out of more than 2200 paintings not one was injured.

In the well-lighted, simple, yet imposing halls of the new building, the incomparably more favourable exhibition of the pictures became at once apparent to the observer. Added to this was the gratifying certainty of being no longer deprived of the pleasure of seeing the pictures in winter.

Among the greatest advantages of the new building must be reckoned the union under one roof of a large number of works of art which prime of life), Herrn von Quandt, Director Schnorr von Carolsfeld, and Professors Bendemann and Hübner; it was afterwards composed of the three last named alone. After the departure of Bendemann to Düsseldorf, and the death of Rietschel who had been appointed in his place, Prof. C. Peschel filled the vacancy; while more recently, in the place of Dr. A. v. Zahn (appointed a member of the Commission in 1870, and died June 16. 1873), the Professors Director Gruner and Dr. Theod. Grosse, the painter Fried. Preller, and Inspector Schirmer, Restorer of pictures in the Gallery, have been appointed members. Since the death of Director Schnorr v. Carolsfeld, the author has become chairman of the Commission.

had been hitherto scattered about in different buildings. Thus, for instance, a series of the celebrated tapestries of Raphael were hung in the centre or cupola room, together with a number of Flemish tapestries of an earlier date, the best of which are probably from cartoons by the celebrated Quentyn Messys (born at Antwerp about 1460, died about 1531), and which were likewise woven in the Netherlands.

The above works, as well as the collection of pastil pictures, the so-called Canalettos, and a series of works by the Saxon court painter Dietrich, or Dietericy, have been especially noticed in separate divisions of Catalogue.

With regard to the tapestries exhibited in the cupola room of the principal story, it is well-known that they owe their origin to an order given by Pope Leo X. to Raphael* to execute eleven coloured cartoons for a series of costly tapestries which were woven in Brussels and intended to decorate the lower spaces of the Sistine Chapel. The city of Arras in Flanders was celebrated, at a yet earlier period, for the productions of its looms whence tapestries of this kind are still known in Italy as "Arazzi".

* Vasari vita di Raffaello. Similmente venne volontà al Papa di far panni d'arazzi ricchissimi d'oro e di seta in filaticci, perchè Raffaello fece in propria forma e grandezza tutti di sua mano i cartoni coloriti, i quali furono mandati in Fiandra a tessersi, e finiti i panni vennero a Roma etc., and later: Costò quest' opera settanta mila Scudi etc. (70,000 Scudi Romani).

These cartoons, made in the years 1514—1516, were the productions of the highest creative power of Raphael, and, with the exception of four which were lost in the course of time, they remained after the completion of the tapestries, in the hands of the Flemish weavers, probably in anticipation of orders for further copies.

Seven only of the best of the original eleven Cartoons of Raphael were discovered by chance in 1630. Although cut into several pieces for the convenience of the weavers, they were comparatively well preserved, and through the agency of Rubens, were purchased for a very large sum by Charles I. of England. The tragical end of that monarch, and the dangers consequent on civil war, caused a renewed disappearance of these recently found treasures, and it was not until the reign of William III. that they were again sought for and found in the above mentioned neglected condition, at the bottom of an old chest. The pieces were now carefully joined together, and the injured places repaired, preparatory to their exhibition in Hampton Court Palace, whence they have since been removed to the South Kensington Museum in London. Of these tapestries there exist several reproductions more or less complete. Besides a series* which is all but complete of the eleven Tapestries in the Vatican, in which the lighter parts of the drapery are interwoven with gold threads, there is also one in the Berlin Museum similarly woven. One set like ours without gold but of the same beautiful deep colouring, the author remembers to have seen in Mantua, and similar reproductions exist in Vienna and other places.

Since the reappearance of our tapestries which will be more particularly noticed hereafter, the very doubtful tradition obtained credence that Pope Leo X. had sent them as a present to Frederick the Wise, Elector of Saxony.

In addition to the difficulty of showing how they could have passed from the possession of the Ernestine to that of the Albertine branch of the Electoral House of Saxony, there was a still greater improbability of the correctness of the above assertion in the circumstance that the tapestries, evidently, do not belong to those first copies, like those in Rome and Berlin, which were executed in the time of Leo and of Raphael.

The first copies of the Raphael tapestries are distinguished from later reproductions, especially by the gold lights woven into them, and the series in Rome is further characterized by frame-like borders woven also after designs by Raphael, while those in Berlin, with one exception, are surrounded only by a narrow garland of leaves. Ours, on the contrary, have wide borders with rich ornaments and figures, somewhat in the style of Perino del Vaga, Primaticcio or of some later hand, certainly not that of Raphael.

But all uncertainty and doubt concerning the origin of our tapestries were laid at rest by the discovery of documentary evidence in the Royal State archives*. A correspondence in the year 1723 between the Saxon Ambassador to Paris, Count Hoym, and the well-known Jacob Heinrich, Count Flemming, Prime Minister and Field Marshal to King Augustus the Strong, gives partial information as to their origin, and a later correspondence between Count Flemming and Court Counsellor Gaultier, proves conclusively their acquisition by King Augustus I. In a letter from Paris dated June 14, 1723, Hoym informs Flemming that six tapestries, after Raphael's drawings, were among the effects of Cardinal Fürstenberg and might be purchased at the low price of 3000 to 3500 Thalers. Flemming offered 3000 Thalers; on the 6th of September of that year, Hoym announces the purchase, and in a later letter says that he has succeeded in obtaining a reduction of 789 livres from the original demand of 3000 Thalers. Hoym's last letter of Oct. 11, 1723, announces the departure of the packing cases from Paris and they must have reached Dresden in good condition soon afterwards.

* The author is indebted for this information to Dr. v. Weber, Min.-Counsellor and Keeper of the Records, whose untiring zeal in bringing to light the hidden treasures of this rich mine of information cannot be too gratefully acknowledged.

 William Egon, Bishop of Strassburg, made Cardinal in 1686, died 1704. There must have been similar Raphael tapestries at a later time in Strassburg, as Goethe mentions in "Dichtung und Wahrheit", some which were employed to decorate a pavilion on the island of Rheinau on the occasion of the celebration of the marriage of Marie Antoinette in 1770.

The second portion of the information consists, as has been mentioned, of a correspondence between Flemming and Court Counsellor Gaultier. The first document is a letter from the Field Marshal dated June 12, 1726, in which he offers the tapestries to the King for sale. Several letters were exchanged in which the old warrior presses the sale in humorous style. The final result is not mentioned in any extant letter, but it is implied in a Royal order according to which His Majesty purchases from the General Field Marshal "certain tapestries made by Raphael for the sum of 12,000 Thalers, and a diamond weighing 54 grains, valued at 18,000 Thalers; making a total of 30,000 Thalers, to be paid out of the Savings Fund".

It is also mentioned in the above correspondence that Cardinal Fürstenberg had procured the tapestries in England, and it is not impossible that they were woven there, after Raphael's cartoons in the time of Charles I. in the establishment at Mortlake which had been founded under James I. by Sir Francis Crane*.

The Cardinal had attached his coat of arms to the borders of the tapestries, but they must have been simply sewn on, as Hoym proposes that they should be removed and replaced by the Flemming arms. Flemming, however, preferred a simple "Cartouche", without any arms, and thus they have remained until the present time.

 Hoym, on that occasion, called attention to the existence of a manufactory in Dresden where

Our tapestries also disappeared for some time, and the merit of finding them again belongs to Freiherrn von Racknitz, Marshal of the Household to the Elector Frederick Augustus, the particulars of which are given by him in a report dated Nov. 7, 1790. He had learned in the course of some private Lectures given by Prof. Casanova that Pope Leo X. had presented a set of the tapestries to Charles V., and another to Frederick the Wise. Induced thereby to make a "thorough examination of all rooms hung with tapestry, and of all old, and unused furniture", he found at last in the rooms of H. R. H. Princess Augusta, four pieces of tapestry much faded, and he afterwards discovered two more in good preservation in the so-called "Garde-Meubles". The seventh, one of the finest, representing the story of Ananias and Sapphira was no where to be found. In the tapestry in which Paul is represented as striking Elymas the Sorcerer with blindness, one side containing the figure of Paul and some others is wanting; it seems however, to have been woven thus, in order to fit some particular place.

It seems strange that within the short space of some 60 years which elapsed between the acquisition of these tapestries and their recovery, they could have been so completely forgotten, such work could be executed. Haute-lisse tapestries were in fact made at that time in Dresden by French workmen for Royal use, and such tapestries chiefly after paintings by Silvestre, signed P. Mercier à Dresden anno 1716 and 1719, are still in the Royal Palace in this city.

even though this time included the troubled period of the Seven Years' War. Nor is it less remarkable that an entirely false account of Casanova's should have actually led to their discovery.

At the suggestion of Herrn von Racknitz, the four tapestries in the palace were taken down, cleansed, and handed over to Count Marcolini, at that time General Director of the Academies, to be hung up with the two others. They were placed in a room in the Brühl Palace to which the public had access at appointed hours, but were hung in so bad a light that they may be considered as only now exhibited in a manner worthy their great value.

"In addition to these precious tapestries" v. Racknitz continues in his report, "I have been so fortunate as to find six others representing the Passion of our Saviour, and which were woven from designs probably made by the celebrated Lucas Cranach". These are doubtless the rare and remarkable tapestries which are now placed under the above mentioned Raphael tapestries in the Hall of the Cupola in the New Museum. They are certainly not, however, as Racknitz supposes, after designs by L. Cranach, but by several masters of the early Flemish school. The two finest, those representing Christ bearing the Cross, and the Crucifixion, may be attributed without hesitation to Quintin Massys, to whose pictures they bear great resemblance. The value of these tapestries is the greater as our Gallery possesses but few pictures of the early Flemish school, which in these admirable and masterly works appears perhaps to even greater advantage than in most of the still existing and much smaller paintings of that school.

Once again (as if this were the inevitable fate of all tapestries,) they disappeared, being in Marcolini's time, no doubt, considered as not worth exhibiting, and they were not again found till 1854, then, as before, quite by chance, in the rooms of the "Garde-Meubles" in the Brühl Palace. At the opening of the New Museum they were, by special permission of His Majesty placed in the Gallery for their better preservation in future.

The ground floor of the new building likewise afforded facilities for the more convenient and advantageous exhibition of whole series of works by the same master which were previously only to be found either in the old Gallery or in other places difficult of access to the public.

In this category belong the unusually rich series of pastil pictures, which formerly composed the so-called Pastil Cabinet and which, as already mentioned, partly in the works of A. R. Mengs which are of real artistic value*, and partly in a series of portraits of the most distinguished personages of that brilliant period of Dresden and the Court of Saxony, possess a peculiar, though for the most part a local interest.

There is in the same suite of rooms, a large collection of works of the well-known Electoral court painter Ernst Christian Dietrich, or Die-teriory, who, with a great amount of talent and skill, copied at one time Rembrandt, at another Correggio or Poelenburg or others, so that at last he resembled the American mocking-bird, which from constantly imitating the songs of a variety of other birds, ends by forgetting its own native notes.

Among the best works in this division of the Collection are a number of pictures by the inimitable painter of architecture, Bernardo Belotto, surnamed Canaletto, and by his uncle and master Canale.

For these works, so far at least as they represent views of Dresden and the neighbourhood we are chiefly indebted to the love of splendour and of art which induced Count Brühl to order them of the artist for the decoration of his palace. After the death of the Count the poor painter applied for the arrears of his payment, and as the heirs were disinclined to comply with his demand, the pictures were purchased for the sake of Canaletto by the Saxon court. The price, considering the excellence of the work was, moreover, very moderate; for the paintings, some of which were very large, cost on an average 200 Thalers, and the arrears amounted to 4200 Thalers for twenty one views, painted between 1747 and 1755*.

* The account is as follows:

1747—1752	Thirteen pictures of Dresden at 200 Thlr. =	2600.
1753	Three views of Pirna at 200 Thlr. =	600.
1754	Three do. do. do.	600.
1755	Two do. do. do.	400.
	Thlr.	4200.

In our opinion the peculiar affinity between the several collections last mentioned, yet more than their uncontested artistic value, produces an effect which every thoughtful observer must have often experienced in himself and witnessed in others.

The figures of that period of splendour under Augustus the Strong and under his son Augustus the Magnificent, as the chronicles of the Middle Ages would have called him, appear as if living before our eyes. The heroically calm and confident Maurice of Saxony and his beautiful sister Orszelska, the first love of Frederick the Great; — the old Ismael Mengs with his celebrated son, and the "belle Chocolatière"*, who became afterwards Princess Dietrichstein and has been since copied times without number; — the beautiful, and clever wife of the insignificant painter Thiele; — von Hoffmann, that type of the true courtier, whose character is expressed by his very name; — the dancer and Countess Barberina-Cocceji, who distinguished herself afterwards in Sanssouci; — Annibali, the handsome singer and favourite of the ladies of that time; — the petted Mingotti, "prima donna cantante"; — and finally the lovely Cupid of Mengs, the enchanting divinity of those joyous days, and his whole court, the powdered abbés and the shepherdessess with jet black eyes and blue ribbons who insensibly constitute the transition to the crayon ideals of Rosalba, to her Magdalens and divinities!

What words could attempt to place side by side, even in outline, the opposite characters which chance has here thrown into such remarkable juxtaposition — a motley, yet pale troop of shadows!

Truly, by crayons alone could they be depicted — the colours of their day. The dust of the butterfly's wing for these inconstant butterflies themselves, these wanton flutterers of the day and night! Who could translate such beings into oils, or into the harsh Tempera of Giotto!

A coloured "Pulvis et umbra* sumus!" they call to us these silent actors on that splendid stage, which ten steps farther rises before us under the faithful brush of Canaletto. The whole of the Dresden of that time, together with its neighbourhood is brought before us enlivened by the most charming accessories by his friend Torelli, who displays less talent in his altar pieces in the catholic church than here where he depicts the stiff pomp of the Electoral cortège; the red-coated guard under arms, each of the portly powdered soldiers fully two steps from his comrade; and on the side walk, the reverent citizens bowing so low that their huge pigtails stand erect in the air. The mountebank and charlatan, with the honest buffoon of the good old times; the street celebrities of the period, the court Turks and chamber hussars; — and the last picture of Canaletto like a "memento mori" between — the ruined tower of the Kreuzkirche destroyed by cannon balls; the same which stood before us but a moment since in other pictures standing as proudly as if destined to remain for all time!

The pencil of the artist has indeed here written a chapter of historical memoirs, and one might venture to predict that many a romance will yet be here suggested to the poetic imagination.

Indulgent readers will, however, pardon the biographer of the Gallery for suffering himself so near the close of his labours to be tempted away from his dry chronicle into a description of pictures. He may serve as a warning to others of the danger of venturing into the atmosphere of this hot-house of the imagination on the ground-floor of the Museum, and either seek or avoid it as best suits his pleasure.

A period of more than one hundred years in the history of the Gallery is closed with the removal of the pictures from their old quarters; the present attempt at a historical sketch of this period is intended simply to mark and commemorate so important an epoch. A new era is inaugurated by the completion of the New Museum; may it be also the beginning of renewed care and protection for the tender flower of living art, the cultivation of which evinces the truest veneration for the past.

May the new building ever remain memorable to us as the noble bequest of our revered sovereign, Frederick Augustus, worthily completed by his illustrious successor, and thus doubly dedicated, not to Saxony alone, nor to the whole German nation alone, but to the whole cultivated world for ages and generations yet unborn, a temple to the noble and the beautiful, the Palladium of this delightful city. May it become a goal for the thoughtful pilgrim of every nation who can here gratefully admire the finest works of his own country, brought together by the hand of Saxon sovereigns.

So tretet ein in aller Geister Gunst,
Willkommen seid im Heiligthum der Kunst,
Im Tempelraum, der Tages Lärm entnommen, „Im Heiligthum der Kunst willkommen!"*

* Inscription over the doors of the Cupola Room.

Dresden, 1876.

The Cupola Saloon.

This saloon contains six pieces of Netherlands Tapestry, some of which are without doubt from Cartoons by Quintin Massys (Matsys), who was born at Antwerp about 1460, and died about 1531.

Above these, are six others belonging to the well known series made after Cartoons by Raphael. Particulars of both in the Introduction. Page. 76.

A. Old Netherlands Tapestry.

Property of His Majesty. In 1853 they were again found in the Brühl Palace.

a. The Crucifixion. In composition, arrangement, drawing and execution, the best of the whole series. 3,36 h., 3,29 w.

b. Christ bearing the Cross. 3,44 h., 3,38 w.

c. The Adoration of the Shepherds. 3,47 h., 3,36 w.
The Cartoon for this Tapestry is ascribed by M. Alfred Michiels in the last edition of his Histoire de l'art flamande to Henri met de Bles, which seems justified by the circumstance that the owl (the monogram of this artist) is twice found in the border of the Tapestry mentioned under f. On the pocket of a sheperd-boy a „fleur de lis", heraldic sign of the city of Lille.

d. The Ascension. 3,42, h., 3,33 w.

e. Same subject by another hand and less beautiful. 2,96 h., 2,88 w.

f. The Last Supper, also by another hand, and both probably by the same Master, as appears in the similarity in the rich margin of flowers and birds. The borders of the first four Tapestries are of rare beauty in the arrangement and execution. 3,05 h., 2,84 w.

B. Tapestries after Cartoons by Raphael.

Purchased of General-Field-Marshal Count Flemming in 1728 for 12,000 Thlr.; in 1790 again found by the Hausmarshal Freiherr von Racknitz. See the introduction. P. 80.

g. A lame man healed by the Apostles Peter and John at the gate of the temple called "Beautiful". Acts. ch. iii. 1. and following verses. 4,23 h., 6,35 w.

h. Paul punishing Elymas the sorcerer with blindness. Acts. ch. xiii, 6 to 12. 4,23 h., 3,03 w.

The right side representing Paul und Barnabas with several other figures is wanting.

i. The sacrifice at Lystra, where Paul having healed a lame man, he and Barnabas are about to be worshiped as Jupiter and Mercury. Acts. ch. xiv, 8 to 18. 4,23 h., 6,35 w.

k. The miraculous draught of fishes. Luke. ch. v, 1 to 11. 4,23 h., 5,00 w.

l. Christ after his resurrection, saying to Peter: "Feed my sheep". John ch. xxi, 15 to 24. 4,23 h., 6,15 w.

m. Paul preaching at Athens. Acts. ch. xvii, 22 and the following verses. 4,23 h., 5,25 w.

Byzantine School.

Ruiz (Pedro). (?)

600. (J. 2.) Christ bound to a pillar; before him kneels St. Peter in episcopal vestments. On wood, 1,73 h., 0,72 w.

Purchased under this name, which, however, does not occur in the work of Cean Bermudez entitled: Diccionario historico etc. Passavant in the Deutsche Kunstbl. for the year 1853, No. 11, mentions a picture in the Cathedral in Cordova dated 1475, and signed: "Pedro de Cordova pitor", which is, perhaps, by the above master.

In the Museum of Madrid, there is no picture by this master, who reminds one of Alunno (Umbrian School) and Fr. Francia.

Inscription on the picture in Gothic letters: l esta : pieca : dexo : pero : ruiz guarnicioner'o : q̄ : dios : perdone : en : gloria : y : alavanca : de : dios : nró : señor : y : de : su : gloriasa (sic) : madre.

The word "dexo" (fundavit) makes it more probable, that Pedro Ruiz was not the painter but the donor of the picture, especially as "guarnicionero" signifies, one whom we should call a maker of harness, or trunks. C. L. P.* Price, £ 11.

Morales (Luis de), named el Divino.

Rem. The pictures of David de Heem, Jan Davidze his son, the most distinguished of all (See No. 1156) and his sons, Jan and Cornelis de Heem, are, when not signed, difficult to be distinguished from one another. They certainly painted for one another, and especially Jan Davidze employed the assistance of his sons. That Jan de Heem was an artist of great merit is proved by his great and beautiful picture, No. 1165, which bears his full signature which is a rarity of great value, as there are few pictures with his autograph. Also, among the pictures which bear the name of Cornelis, there are excellent works that compare favourably with those of his father. See Nos. 1168 and 1169.

Pieter de Ring, lived about 1650.

Remark. With so large a number of the works of this master, as is only to be found in the Royal Gallery of this city, the idea of venturing an attempt to make a classification of them in a historical series was obvious, and, at least for the benefit of the unprofessional observer, to group together those, which have the same general characteristics. With this view, those works of the artist which, by a more decided green in the land scape; a species of hardness in the local tone; and a more distinct character in the figures, are materially distinguished from the perfection, and, finally, the exaggerated softness of the later works, have been arranged together in the first eight numbers. To the period of transition to the later style, belong, perhaps, the next ten numbers, which are followed by eighteen of the nearly perfect works, those which are only exceeded by sixteen of the most excellent and universally acknowledged master-pieces. The next six exhibit a transition to an inferior style, which is represented by only two pictures, while five inferior, and partly spurious paintings, constitute the close of the series. Many attribute works like those numbered 1325 to 1333 to Jan and Pieter Wouverman but this can be determined with accuracy only when the genuine monogram is affixed, as the brothers, probably, frequently painted on the same pictures — Philipp giving the last touches. Therefore, almost all the pictures with a signature bear the monogram of Philipp (for those signed with P. H. W. can be attributed only to the latter) most of them genuine, but some, especially the last numbers of the series, certainly spurious.

Remark. The pictures of this master furnished with dates comprise a period of 47 years, if the incomplete date of the first picture is filled out with 9 (from 1669 to 1718). This does not, it is true, correspond with the year of his birth, 1659, although the precocious boy was apprenticed at the early age of 10 years. The figures 166 have, however, been pronounced perfectly correct and genuine after the closest examination. Likewise, in the second picture, the figures 168 of the date have been established after close examination, but here too even when the date is completed with 9, making 1689, it does not agree with the statement of Nagler, which fixes the marriage of the artist in 1687, as the three children, represented in the picture, certainly appear to be older. The correctness of the signature must here, at all events, be recognized, and perhaps future inquiries will contribute to the explanation.

Remark. The pictures of this master furnished with dates comprise a period of 47 years, if the incomplete date of the first picture is filled out with 9 (from 1669 to 1718). This does not, it is true, correspond with the year of his birth, 1659, although the precocious boy was apprenticed at the early age of 10 years. The figures 166 have, however, been pronounced perfectly correct and genuine after the closest examination. Likewise, in the second picture, the figures 168 of the date have been established after close examination, but here too even when the date is completed with 9, making 1689, it does not agree with the statement of Nagler, which fixes the marriage of the artist in 1687, as the three children, represented in the picture, certainly appear to be older. The correctness of the signature must here, at all events, be recognized, and perhaps future inquiries will contribute to the explanation.

Remark. The pictures of this master furnished with dates comprise a period of 47 years, if the incomplete date of the first picture is filled out with 9 (from 1669 to 1718). This does not, it is true, correspond with the year of his birth, 1659, although the precocious boy was apprenticed at the early age of 10 years. The figures 166 have, however, been pronounced perfectly correct and genuine after the closest examination. Likewise, in the second picture, the figures 168 of the date have been established after close examination, but here too even when the date is completed with 9, making 1689, it does not agree with the statement of Nagler, which fixes the marriage of the artist in 1687, as the three children, represented in the picture, certainly appear to be older. The correctness of the signature must here, at all events, be recognized, and perhaps future inquiries will contribute to the explanation.

Remark. The pictures of this master furnished with dates comprise a period of 47 years, if the incomplete date of the first picture is filled out with 9 (from 1669 to 1718). This does not, it is true, correspond with the year of his birth, 1659, although the precocious boy was apprenticed at the early age of 10 years. The figures 166 have, however, been pronounced perfectly correct and genuine after the closest examination. Likewise, in the second picture, the figures 168 of the date have been established after close examination, but here too even when the date is completed with 9, making 1689, it does not agree with the statement of Nagler, which fixes the marriage of the artist in 1687, as the three children, represented in the picture, certainly appear to be older. The correctness of the signature must here, at all events, be recognized, and perhaps future inquiries will contribute to the explanation.

Remark. The pictures of this master furnished with dates comprise a period of 47 years, if the incomplete date of the first picture is filled out with 9 (from 1669 to 1718). This does not, it is true, correspond with the year of his birth, 1659, although the precocious boy was apprenticed at the early age of 10 years. The figures 166 have, however, been pronounced perfectly correct and genuine after the closest examination. Likewise, in the second picture, the figures 168 of the date have been established after close examination, but here too even when the date is completed with 9, making 1689, it does not agree with the statement of Nagler, which fixes the marriage of the artist in 1687, as the three children, represented in the picture, certainly appear to be older. The correctness of the signature must here, at all events, be recognized, and perhaps future inquiries will contribute to the explanation.
